dua shewed to Alexander the prophecy of Daniel "that a Greek should destroy the Persian Empire." For there is no ground to question the account of Josephus. The mission then of Jonah to Nineveh is in harmony with God's other dealings with heathen nations, although, in God's manifold wisdom, not identical with any.

To Israel the history of that mission revealed that same fact which was more fully declared by S. Peter!; I perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him. This righteous judgment of God stands out the more, alike in the history of the mariners and of the Ninevites, in that the character of both is exhibited advantageously, in comparison with that of the Prophet. The Prophet brings out the awe, the humanity, the earnestness of the natural religion, and the final conversion of the sailors, and the zealous repentance of the Ninevites, while he neglects to explain his own character, or, in the least, to soften its hard angles. Rather, with a holy indifference, he has left his character to be hardly and unjustly judged by those who, themselves sharing his infirmities, share not his excellences. Disobedient once, he cares only to teach us what God taught him for us. The mariners were spared, the Hebrew Prophet was cast forth as guilty. The Ninevites were forgiven: the Prophet, rebuked.

That other moral, which our Lord inculcated, that the heathen believed and repented with less light, the Jews, amid so much greater light, repented not, also lay there, to be drawn out by men's own consciences. "To the condemnation of Israel," says S. Jerome, "Jonah is sent to the Gentiles, because, whereas Nineveh repented, Israel persevered in his iniquity." But this is only a secondary result of his prophecy, as all Divine history must be full of teaching, because the facts themselves are instructive. Its instructiveness in this respect depends wholly upon the truth of the facts. It is the real repentance of the Ninevites, which becomes the reproach of the impenitent Jew or Christian.

Even among the Jews, a large school, the Cabbalists, (although amid other error,) interpreted the history of Jonah as teaching the resurrection of the dead, and (with that remarkable correctness of combination of different passages of Holy Scripture which we often find) in union with the prophecy of Hosea. "The fish's belly, where Jonah was enclosed, signifies the tomb, where the body is covered and laid up. But as Jonah was given back on the third day, so shall we also on the third day rise again and be restored to life. As Hosea says, On the third day He will raise us up, and we shall live in His sight." Talmudic Jews<sup>a</sup> identified Jonah with their Messiah ben Joseph, whom they expected to die and rise again. The deeper meaning then of the history was not, at least in later times, unknown to them, a meaning which entirely depended on its truth.

The history of his mission, Jonah doubtless himself wrote. Such has been the uniform tradition of the Jews, and on this principle alone was his book placed among the prophets. For no books were admitted among the prophets but those which the arranger of the Canon believed (if this was the work of the great synagogue) or (if it was the work of Ezra) knew, to have been written by persons called to the prophetic office. Hence the Psalms of David, (although many are prophetic, and our Lord declares him to have been inspired by the Holy Ghost), and the book of Daniel, were placed in a separate class, because their authors, although eminently endowed with prophetic gifts, did not exercise the pastoral office of the Prophet. Histories of the Prophets, as Elijah and Elisha, stand, not under their own names, but in the books of the prophets who wrote them. Nor is the book of Jonah a history of the Prophet, but of that one mission to Nineveh. Every notice of the Prophet is omitted, except what bears on that mission. The book also begins with just that same authentication, with which all other prophetic books begin. As Hosea and Joel and Micah and Zephaniah open, The word of the Lord that came unto Hosea, Joel, Micah, Zephaniah, and other prophets in other ways ascribe their books not to themselves, but to God, so Jonah opens, And the word of the Lord came unto Jonah, the son of Amittai, saying. This inscription is an integral part of the book; as is marked by the word, saying. As the historical books are joined on to the sacred writings before them, so as to form one continuous stream of history, by the and, with which they begin, so the book of Jonah is tacitly joined on to other books of other prophets by the word, and, with which it commences<sup>b</sup>. The words, The word of the Lord came to, are the acknowledged form<sup>c</sup> in which the commission of God to prophesy is recorded. It is used of the commission to deliver a single prophecy, or it describes the whole collection of prophecies, with which any prophet was entrusted; The word of the Lord which came to Micah or Zephaniah. But the whole history of the prophecy is bound up with, and a sequel of those words.

Nor is there anything in the style of the Prophet at variance with this.

It is strange that, at any time beyond the babyhood of criticism, any argument should be drawn from the fact that the Prophet writes of himself in the third person. Manly criticism has been ashamed to use the argument, as to the commentaries of Caesar or the Anabasis of Xenophon<sup>d</sup>. However the genuineness of those works may have been at times questioned, here we were on the ground of genuine criticism, and no one ventured to use an argument so palpably idle. It has been pointed out that minds so different, as Barhebræus, the great Jacobite historian of the East<sup>e</sup>, and Frederick the Great wrote of themselves in the third person; as did also Thucydides and Josephus<sup>f</sup>, even after they had attested that the history, in which they so speak, was written by themselves.

But the real ground lies much deeper. It is the exception, when any sacred writer speaks of himself in the first person. Ezra and Nehemiah do so; for they are giving an account, not of God's dealings with His people, but of their own discharge of a definite office, allotted to them by man. Solomon does so in Ecclesiastes, because he is giving the history of his own experience; and the vanity of all human things, in themselves, could be attested so impressively by no one, as by one who had had all which man's mind could imagine.

On the contrary, the Prophets, unless they speak of God's revelations to them, speak of themselves in the third person. Thus Amos relates in the first person, what God shewed him in vision<sup>g</sup>; for God spoke to him, and he answered and pleaded with God. In relating his persecution by Amaziah, he passes at once to the third; Amaziah said to Amos; Then answered Amos and said to Amaziah. In like way, Isaiah speaks of himself in the third person, when relating how God sent him to meet Abaz<sup>h</sup>; commanded him to walk three years, naked and barefoot<sup>i</sup>, Hezekiah's message to him, to pray for his people, and his own prophetic answer; his visit to Hezekiah in the king's sickness, his warning to him, his prophecy of his recovery, the sign which at God's command Isaiah gave him, and the means of healing he appointed<sup>a</sup>. Jeremia, the mourner over his people more than any other prophet, speaks and complains to his God in the midst of his prophecy. In no other prophet do we see so much the workings of his inmost soul. Such souls would most use the first person; for it is in the use of the first person that the soul pours itself forth. In relating of himself in the third person, the Prophet restrains himself, speaks of the event only. Yet it is thus that Jeremia relates almost all which befell him; Pashur's smiting him and putting him in the stocks<sup>b</sup>; the gathering of the people against him to put him to death, his hearing before the princes of Judah and his deliverance<sup>c</sup>; the contest with Hananiah, when Hananiah broke off the symbolic yoke from his neck and prophesied lies in the name of God, and Jeremiah foretold his death<sup>d</sup>, which followed; the letters of Shemaiah against him, and his own prophecy against Shemaiah<sup>e</sup>; his trial of the Rechabites and his prophecy to them<sup>f</sup>; the writing the roll, which he sent Baruch to read in God's house, and its renewal when Jehoiakim had burnt it, and God's concealing him and Baruch from the king's emissaries<sup>g</sup>; his purpose to leave Jerusalem when the interval of the last siege gave him liberty<sup>h</sup>; the false accusations against him, the designs of the princes to put him to death, their plunging him in the yet deeper pit, where was no water but mire, the milder treatment through the intercession of Ebedmelech; Zedekiah's intercourse with him<sup>i</sup>; his liberation by Nebuzaradan, his choice to abide in the land, his residence with Gedaliah<sup>k</sup>; Johanan's hypocritical enquiring of God by him and disobedience<sup>l</sup>, his being carried into Egypt<sup>m</sup>, the insolent answer of the Jews in Egypt to him and his denunciation upon them<sup>n</sup>. All this, the account of which occupies a space, many times larger than the book of Jonah, Jeremia relates as if it were the history of some other man. So did God teach His prophets to forget themselves. Haggai, whose prophecy consists of exhortations which God directed him to address to the people, speaks of himself, solely in the third person. He even relates the questions which he put to the priests and their answers still in the third person<sup>o</sup>; "then said Haggai," "then answered Haggai." Daniel relates in the third person, the whole which he does give of his history; how when young he obtained exemption from the use of the royal luxuries and from food unlawful to him; the favour and wisdom which God gave him<sup>p</sup>; how God saved him from death, revealing to him, on his prayer, the dream of Nebuchadnezzar and its meaning; how Nebuchadnezzar made him ruler over the whole province of Babylon<sup>q</sup>; how he was brought into Belshazzar's great impious feast, and interpreted the writing on the wall; and was honoured<sup>r</sup>; how, under Darius, he persevered in his wonted prayer against the king's command, was cast into the den of lions, was delivered, and prospered in the reign of Darius and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian<sup>s</sup>. When Daniel passes from history to relate visions vouchsafed to himself, he authenticated them with his own name, I Daniel<sup>t</sup>. It is no longer his own history. It is the revelation of God by him. In like way, S. John, when referring to himself in the history of his Lord, calls himself the disciple whom Jesus loved. In the Revelations, he authenticates his visions by his own name; "I John". Moses relates how God commanded him to write things which he wrote, in the third person. S. Paul, when he has to speak of his overpowering revelations, says, I knew a man in Christ. It seems as if he could not speak of them as vouchsafed to himself. He lets us see that it was himself, when he speaks of the humiliations<sup>u</sup>, which God saw to be necessary for him. To ordinary men it would be conceit or hypocrisy to write of themselves in the third person. They would have the appearance of writing impartially of themselves, of abstracting themselves from themselves, when, in reality, they were ever present to themselves. The men of God were writing of the things of God. They had a God-given indifference how they themselves would be thought of by man. They related, with the same holy unconcern, their praise or their blame. Jonah has exhibited himself in his infirmities, such as no other but himself would have drawn a Prophet of God. He has left his character, unexplained, unsoftened; he has left himself lying under God's reproof; and told us nothing of all that which God loved in him, and which made him too a chosen instrument of God. Men, while they measure Divine things, or characters formed by God, by what would be natural to themselves, measure by a crooked rule. "It is a very small thing," says S. Paul, that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment. Nature does not measure grace; nor the human spirit, the Divine.

As for the few words, which persons who disbelieved in miracles selected out of the book of Jonah as a plea for removing it far down beyond the period when those miracles took place<sup>v</sup>, they rather indicate the contrary. They are all genuine Hebrew words or forms, except the one Aramaic name for the decree of the king of Nineveh, which Jonah naturally heard in Nineveh itself.

A writer<sup>w</sup>, equally unbelieving, who got rid of the miracles by assuming that the book of Jonah was meant only for a moralising fiction, found no counter-evidence in the language, but ascribed it unhesitatingly to the Jonah, son of Amittai, who prophesied in the reign of Jeroboam II. He saw the nothingness of the so-called proof, which he had no longer any interest in maintaining.

The examination of these words will require a little detail, yet it may serve as a specimen (it is no worse than its neighbours) of the way in which the disbelieving school picked out a few words of a Hebrew Prophet or section of a Prophet, in order to disparage the genuineness of what they did not believe.

The words are these;

1) The word sephinah, lit. "a decked vessel," is a genuine Hebrew word from saphan, "covered, ceiled<sup>x</sup>." The word was borrowed from the Hebrew, not by Syrians or Chaldees only but by the Arabians, in none of which dialects is it an original word. A word plainly is original in that language in which it stands connected with other meanings of the same root, and not in that in which it stands isolated. Naturally too, the term for a decked vessel would be borrowed by inland people, as the Syrians, from a notion living on the sea shore, not conversely. This is the first occasion for mentioning a decked vessel. It is related that Jonah went in fact "below deck," was gone down into the sides of the decked vessel. Three times in those verses<sup>y</sup>, when Jonah did not wish to express that the vessel was decked, he uses the common Hebrew word, oniyyah. It was then opinion of those who think that Jonah himself committed to writing in this book what befel himself, since we do not admit that any real history is contained in it. "Formerly, when people saw in the book of Jonah pure history, no one doubted that the Prophet Jonah himself wrote his wondrous lot." Bertholdt, Einl. § 561. Paulus, Memorabil. St. 6. p. 69. <sup>a</sup> cover occurs in Talmudic (as derived from the Hebrew) not in Chald. In Arabic it means "planed," smoothed, swept the earth, not "ceiled." So our deck is from the Dutch dekken, to cover. <sup>b</sup> i. 8, 4, 5.

circumstances of Jonah, as a native of North Palestine, conversing with Phœnician mariners. The only plea of argument has been gained by arguing in a circle, assuming without any even plausible ground that the Song of Solomon or Psalms of David were late, because they had this form, and then using it as a test of another book being late; ignoring alike the earlier books which have it and the later books which have it not, and its exceptional use (except in the Canticles and Ecclesiastes,) in the books which have it.

7) It is difficult to know to what end the use of manah, "appoint" or "prepare," is alleged, since it occurs in a Psalm of David<sup>m</sup>. Jonah uses it in a special way as to acts of God's Providence, "preparing" before, what He wills to employ. Jonah uses the word of the "preparing" of the fish, the palm-christ, the worm which should destroy it, the East wind. He evidently used it with a set purpose, to express what no other word expressed equally to his mind, how God prepared by His Providence the instruments which He willed to employ.

8) There remains only the word used for the decree of the king of Nineveh, taam. This is a Syriac word; and accordingly, since it has now been ascertained beyond all question, that the language of Nineveh was a dialect of Syriac, it was, with a Hebrew pronunciation<sup>n</sup>, the very word used of this decree at Nineveh. The employment of the special word is a part of the same accuracy with which Jonah relates that the decree used was issued not from the king only, but from the king and his nobles, one of those minute touches, which occur in the writings of those who describe what they have seen, but supplying a fact as to the Assyrian polity, which we should not otherwise have known, that the nobles were in some way associated in the decrees of the king.

Out of these eight words or forms, three are naval terms, and, since Israel was no seafaring people, it is in harmony with the history, that these terms should first occur in the first prophet who left the land of his mission by sea. So it is also, that an Assyrian technical term should first occur in a prophet who had been sent to Nineveh. A fifth word occurs in Hosea, a contemporary of Jonah, and in a Psalm of David. The abridged grammatical form was Phœnician, not Aramaic, was used in conversation, occurs in the oldest proper names, and in the Northern tribes. The 7th and 8th do not occur in Aramaic in the meaning in which they are used by Jonah.

In truth, often as these false criticisms have been repeated from one to the other, they would not have been thought of at all, but for the miracles related by Jonah, which the devisers of these criticisms did not believe. A history of miracles, such as those in Jonah, would not be published at the time, unless they were true. Those then who did not believe that God worked any miracles, were forced to have some plea for saying that the book was not written in the time of Jonah. Prejudices against faith have, sometimes openly, sometimes tacitly, been the ruling principle on which earlier portions of Holy Scripture have been classed among the later by critics who disbelieved what those books or passages related. Obviously no weight can be given to the opinions of critics, whose criticisms are founded, not on the study of the language, but on unbelief. It has recently been said, "the joint decision of Gesenius, De Wette and Hitzig ought to be final." A joint decision certainly it is not. For De Wette places the book of Jonah before the captivity<sup>p</sup>; Gesenius<sup>q</sup> and Ewald<sup>r</sup>, when prophecy had long ceased; Ewald, partly on account of its miracles, in the 5th century, B.C.; and Hitzig, with his wonted wilfulness and insulいたness of criticism, built a theory that the book is of Egyptian origin on his own mistake that the kikaion grew only in Egypt, and placed it in the 2nd century, B.C., the times of the Maccabees<sup>s</sup>. The interval is also filled up. Every sort of date and contradictory grounds for those dates have been assigned. So then one places the book of Jonah in the time of Sennacherib<sup>t</sup>, i.e. of Hezekiah; another under Josiah<sup>u</sup>; another before the Captivity<sup>v</sup>; another towards the end of the Captivity, after the destruction of Nineveh by Cyaxares<sup>w</sup>; a fifth lays chief stress on the argument that the destruction of Nineveh is not mentioned in it<sup>x</sup>; a sixth<sup>y</sup> prefers the time after the return from the Captivity to its close; a seventh doubted not, "from its argument and purpose, that it was written before the order of prophets ceased<sup>z</sup>," others of the same school are as positive from its arguments and contents, that it must have been written after that order was closed<sup>a</sup>.

The style of the book of Jonah is, in fact, pure and simple Hebrew, corresponding to the simplicity of the narrative and of the Prophet's character. Although written in prose, it has poetic language, not in the thanksgiving only, but whenever it suits the subject. These expressions are peculiar to Jonah. Such are, in the account of the storm, "The Lord cast<sup>b</sup> a strong wind," "the vessel thought<sup>c</sup> to be broken," "the sea shall be silent<sup>d</sup>" (hushed, as we say) i.e. calm; "the wind was advancing and storming<sup>e</sup>," as with a whirlwind; [the word is used as to the sea by Jonah only,] "the men ploughed" or "dug"<sup>f</sup> [in rowing] "the sea stood<sup>g</sup> from its raging." Also "let man and beast clothe themselves<sup>h</sup> with sackcloth," and that touching expression, "son of a night<sup>i</sup>, it [the palma Christi] came to being, and son of a night [i.e. in a night] it perished." It is in harmony with his simplicity of character, that he is fond of the old idiom, by which the thought of the verb is carried on by a noun formed from it. "The men feared a great fear<sup>k</sup>," "It displeased Jonah a great displeasure<sup>l</sup>," "Jonah joyed a great joy<sup>m</sup>." Another idiom<sup>n</sup> has been observed, which occurs in no writer later than the judges.

But in the history every phrase is vivid and graphic. There is not a word which does not advance the history. There is no reflection. All hastens on to the completion, and when God has given the key to the whole, the book closes with His words of exceeding tenderness, lingering in our ears. The Prophet, with the same simplicity and beginning with the same words, says he did not, and he did, obey God. The book opens, after the first authenticating words, Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, and cry against it; for their wickedness is come up before Me. God had bidden him arise<sup>o</sup>; the narrative simply repeats the word, And Jonah arose<sup>p</sup>,—but for what? to flee in the very opposite direction from being before the Lord<sup>q</sup>, i.e. from standing in His Presence, as His servant and minister. He lost no time, to do the contrary. After the miracles, by which he had been both punished and delivered, the history is resumed with the same simple dignity as before, in the same words; the disobedience being noticed only in the word, a second time. And the word of the Lord came to Jonah a second time, saying, Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, and cry unto it that cry which I say unto thee. This time it follows, And Jonah arose and went to Nineveh.

Then in the history itself we follow the Prophet step by step. He arose to flee to Tarshish, went down to Joppa, a perilous, yet the only sea-port for Judæa<sup>a</sup>. He finds the ship, pays its fare, (one of those little touches of a true narrative); God sends the storm, man does all he can; and all in vain. The character of the heathen is brought out in contrast with the then sleeping conscience and despondency of the Prophet. But it is all in act. They are all activity; he, simply passive. They pray, (as they can) each man to his gods; he is asleep: they do all they can, lighten the ship, the ship-master rouses him, to pray to his God, since their own prayers avail not; they propose the lots, cast them; the lot falls on Jonah. Then follow their brief accumulated enquiries; Jonah's calm answer, increasing their fear; their enquiry of the Prophet himself, what they are to do to him; his knowledge that he must be cast over; the unwillingness of the Heathen; one more fruitless effort to save both themselves and the Prophet; the increasing violence of the storm; the prayer to the Prophet's God, not to lay innocent blood to them, who obeyed His Prophet; the casting him forth; the instant hush and silence of the sea; their conversion and sacrifice to the true God—the whole stands before us, as if we saw it with our own eyes.

And yet, amid, or perhaps as a part of, that vividness, there is that characteristic of Scripture-narratives, that some things even seem improbable, until, on thought, we discover the reason. It is not on a first reading, that most perceive the naturalness either of Jonah's deep sleep, or of the increase of the mariners' fear, on his account of himself. Yet that deep sleep harmonises at least with his long hurried flight to Joppa, and that mood with which men who have taken a wrong step, try to forget themselves. He relates that he was gone down<sup>a</sup>, i. e. before the storm began. The sailors' increased fear surprises us the more, since it is added, "they knew that he had fled from before the presence of God, because he had told them." One word explained it. He had told them, from Whose service he had fled, but not that He, against Whom he had sinned, and Who, they would think, was pursuing His fugitive, was "the Maker of the sea," whose raging was threatening their lives.

Again, the history mentions only, that Jonah was cast over; that God prepared a fish to swallow him; that he was in the belly of the fish three days and three nights; that he, at the end of that time, prayed to God out of the fish's belly, and at the close of the prayer was delivered. The word "prayed" obviously includes "thanksgiving" as the act of adoring love from the creature to the Creator. It is said that Hannah prayed<sup>b</sup>; but her hymn, as well as Jonah's does not contain one petition. Both are the outpouring of thanksgiving from the soul, to which God had given what it had prayed for. As, before, it was not said, whether he prayed, on the ship-master's upbraiding, or no, so here nothing is said in the history, except as to the last moment, on which he was cast out on the dry ground. The prayer incidentally supplies the rest. It is a simple thanksgiving of one who had prayed, and had been delivered. "I cried unto the Lord, and He heard me. In the first mercy, he saw the earnest of the rest. He asks for nothing, he only thanks. But that for which he thanks is the deliverance from the perils of the sea. The thanksgiving corresponds with the plain words, that he prayed out of the fish's belly. They are suited to one so praying, who looked on in full faith to the future completion of his deliverance, although our minds might rather have been fixed on the actual peril. It is a thanksgiving of faith, but of stronger faith than many moderns have been able to conceive<sup>c</sup>.

The hymn itself is a remarkable blending of old and new, as our Lord says<sup>d</sup>; Therefore is the kingdom of heaven like a householder, who bringeth out of his treasure new and old. The Prophet teaches us to use the Psalms, as well as how the holy men of old used them. In that great moment of religious life, the well-remembered Psalms, such as he had often used them, were brought to his mind. What had been figures to David or the sons of Korah, as<sup>e</sup>, the waters are come in even unto my soul; all Thy billows and Thy waves passed over me, were strict realities to him. Yet only in this last sentence and in one other sentence which doubtless had become a proverb of accepted prayer, I cried out of my trouble unto the Lord and He heard me, does Jonah use exactly the words of earlier Psalms. Elsewhere he varies or amplifies them according to his own special circumstances. Thus, where David said, "the waters are come in, even unto my soul," Jonah substitutes the word which described best the condition from which God had delivered him, "The water compassed me about, even to the soul." Where David said<sup>f</sup>, "I am cut off from before Thine eyes," expressing an abiding condition, Jonah, who had for disobedience been cast into the sea, uses the strong word, "I am cast out from before Thine eyes." David says, "I said in my haste;" Jonah simply, "I said;" for he had deserved it. David said<sup>g</sup>, "when my spirit was overwhelmed" or "fainted within me," Thou knewest my path;<sup>h</sup> Jonah substitutes, "When my soul fainted within me, I remembered the Lord<sup>i</sup>;" for when he rebelled, he forgot Him. David said, "I hate them that observe lying vanities;" Jonah, who had himself disobeyed God, says mournfully, "They that observe lying vanities, forsake their own mercy," i. e. their God, Who is Mercy.

Altogether, Jonah's thanksgiving is that of one whose mind was stored with the Psalms which were part of the public worship, but it is the language of one who uses and re-casts them freely, as he was taught of God, not of one who copies. No one verse is taken entirely from any Psalm. There are original expressions everywhere<sup>k</sup>. The words, "I went down to the cuttings-off of the mountains," "the sea-weed bound around my head;" "the earth, its bars around me for ever;" perhaps the coral reefs which run along all that shore<sup>l</sup>, vividly exhibit him, sinking, entangled, imprisoned, as it seems, inextricably; he goes on; we should expect some further description of his state; but he adds, in five simple words<sup>m</sup>, Thou broughtest up my life from corruption, O Lord my God. Words, somewhat like these last, occur elsewhere<sup>n</sup>, thou hast brought up my soul from hell, agreeing in the one word "brought up." But the majesty of the Prophet's conception is in the connection of the thought; the sea-weed was bound round his head as his grave-clothes; the solid bars of the deep-rooted earth; were around him, and—God brought him up. At the close of the thanksgiving, Salvation is the Lord's, the deliverance is completed, as though God had only waited for this act of complete faith.

So could no one have written, who had not himself been delivered from such an extreme peril of drowning, as man could not, of himself, escape from. True, that no image so well expresses the overwhelmedness under affliction or temptation, as the pressure of storm by land, or being overflowed by the waves of the sea. Human poetry knows of "a sea of troubles," or "the triple wave of evils." It expresses how we are simply passive and powerless under a trouble, which leaves us neither breath nor power of motion; under which we can be but still, till, by God's mercy it passes. "We are sunk, overhead, deep down in temptations, and the masterful current is sweeping in eddies over us." Of this sort are those images which Jonah took from the Psalms. But a description so minute as the whole of Jonah's would be allegory, not metaphor. What, in it, is most descriptive of Jonah's situation<sup>k</sup>, as "binding of the sea-weed around the head, the sinking down to the roots of the mountains, the bars of the earth around him," are peculiar to this thanksgiving of Jonah; they do not occur elsewhere; for, except through miracle, they would be images not of peril but of death.

The same vividness, and the same steady direction to its end, characterises the rest of the book. Critics have wondered<sup>l</sup>, why Jonah does not say, on what shore he was cast forth, why he does not describe his long journey to Nineveh, or tell us the name of the Assyrian king, or what he himself did, when his mission was closed. Jonah speaks of himself, only as relates to his mission, and God's teaching through him; he tells us not the king's name, but his deeds. The description of the size of Nineveh remarkably corresponds alike with the ancient accounts and modern investigations. Jonah describes it as "a city of three days' journey." This obviously means its circumference; for, unless the city were a circle, (as no cities are,) it would have no one diameter. A person might describe the average length and breadth of a city, but no one who gave any one measure, by days or miles or any other measure, would mean any thing else than its circumference. Diodorus (probably on the authority of Ctesias) states that "it was well-walled, of unequal lengths. Each of the longer sides was 150 furlongs; each of the shorter, 90. The whole circuit then being 480 furlongs [60 miles] the hope of the founder was not disappointed. For no one afterwards built a city of such compass, and with walls so magnificent." To Babylon "Clitarchus and the companions of Alexander in their writings, assigned a circuit of 365 furlongs, adding that the number of furlongs was conformed to the number of days in the year<sup>n</sup>." Ctesias, in round numbers, calls them 360<sup>o</sup>; Strabo, 385<sup>p</sup>. All these accounts agree with the statement of Strabo, "Nineveh was much larger than Babylon<sup>q</sup>." The 60 miles of Diodorus exactly correspond with the three days' journey of Jonah. A traveller of our own at the beginning of the 17th century, J. Cartwright, states that with his own eyes he traced out the ruinous foundations, and gives their dimensions. "It seems by the ruinous foundation (which I thoroughly viewed) that it was built with four sides, but not equal or square. For the two longer sides had each of them (as we guess) 150 furlongs, the two shorter sides ninety furlongs, which amounteth to four hundred and eighty furlongs of ground, which makes threescore miles, accounting eight furlongs to an Italian mile." No one of the four great mounds, which lie around the site of ancient Nineveh, Nimrud, Kouyunjik, Khorsabad, Karamless, is of sufficient moment or extent to be identified with the old Nineveh. But they are connected together by the sameness of their remains. Together they form a parallelogram, and this of exactly the dimensions assigned by Jonah. "From the Northern extremity of Kouyunjik to Nimrud, is about 18 miles, the distance from Nimrud to Karamless, about 12; the opposite sides, the same." "A recent trigonometrical survey of the country by Captain Jones proves, I am informed," says Layard<sup>r</sup>, "that the great ruins of Kouyunjik, Nimrud, Karamless, and Khorsabad form very nearly a perfect parallelogram."

This is perhaps also the explanation, how, seeing its circumference was three days' journey, Jonah entered a day's journey in the city and, at the close of the period, we find him at the East side of the city, the opposite to that at which he had entered.

His preaching seems to have lasted only this one day. He went, we are told, one day's journey in the city. The 150 stadia are nearly 19 miles, a day's journey, so that Jonah walked through it from end to end, repeating that one cry, which God had commanded him to cry. We seem to see the solitary figure of the Prophet, clothed (as was the prophet's dress) in that one rough garment of hair cloth, uttering the cry which we almost hear, echoing in street after street, "ôd arba'im yom venineveh nehpaçeth," "yet forty days and Nineveh overthrown." The words which he says he cried and said, belong to that one day only. For on that one day only, was there still a respite of forty days. In one day, the grace of God prevailed. The conversion of a whole people upon one day's preaching of a single stranger, stands in contrast with the many years during which, God says<sup>s</sup>, since the day that your fathers came forth out of the land of Egypt unto this day, I have sent unto you all My servants the prophets, daily rising up early and sending them, yet they hearkened not unto Me. Many of us have wondered what the Prophet did on the other thirty nine days; people have imagined the Prophet preaching as moderns would, or telling them his own wondrous story of his desertion of God, his miraculous punishment, and, on his repentance, his miraculous deliverance. Jonah says nothing of this. The one point he brought out was the conversion of the Ninevites. This he dwells on in circumstantial details. His own part he suppresses; he would be, like S. John Baptist, but the voice of one crying in the wild waste of a city of violence.

This simple message of Jonah bears an analogy to what we find elsewhere in Holy Scripture. The great preacher of repentance, S. John Baptist, repeated doubtless oftentimes that one cry<sup>t</sup>, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Our Lord vouchsafed to begin His own office with those self-same words<sup>u</sup>. And probably, among the civilised but savage inhabitants of Nineveh, that one cry was more impressive than any other would have been. Simplicity is always impressive.

They were four words which God caused to be written on the wall amid Belshazzar's impious revelry<sup>a</sup>; Mene, mene, tekél, upharsin. We all remember the touching history of Jesus the son of Anan, an unlettered rustic, who, "four years before the war, when Jerusalem was in complete peace and affluence," burst in on the people at the feast of tabernacles with one oft-repeated cry, "A voice from the East, a voice from the West, a voice from the four winds, a voice on Jerusalem and the temple, a voice on the bridegrooms and the brides, a voice on the whole people;" how he went about through all the lanes of the city, repeating, day and night, this one cry; and when scourged until his bones were laid bare, echoed every lash with "woe, woe, to Jerusalem," and continued as his daily dirge and his one response to daily good or ill-treatment, "woe, woe, to Jerusalem." The magistrates and even the cold Josephus thought that there was something in it above nature.

In Jerusalem, no effect was produced, because they had filled up the measure of their sins and God had abandoned them. All conversion is the work of the grace of God. That of Nineveh remains, in the history of mankind, an insulated instance of God's overpowering grace. All which can be pointed out as to the book of Jonah, is the latent suitability of the instruments employed. We know from the Cuneiform Inscriptions that Assyria had been for successive generations at war<sup>b</sup> with Syria. Not until the time of Ivalush or Pul<sup>c</sup>, the Assyrian monarch, probably, at the time of Jonah's mission, do we find them tributary to Assyria. They were hereditary enemies of Assyria, and probably their chief opponents on the North East. The breaking of their power then, under Jeroboam, which Jonah had foretold, had an interest for the Assyrians; and Jonah's prophecy and the fact of its fulfilment may have reached them. The history of his own deliverance, we know from our Lord's own words, did reach them. He was a sign<sup>d</sup> unto the Ninevites. The word, under which he threatened their destruction, pointed to a miraculous overthrow. It was a turning upside down<sup>e</sup>, like the overthrow of the five cities of the plain which are known throughout the Old Testament<sup>f</sup>, and still throughout the Mohammedan East, by the same name, "almoutaphikat<sup>g</sup>, the overthrown."

The Assyrians also, amidst their cruelties, had a great reverence for their gods, and (as appears from the inscriptions) ascribed to them their national greatness<sup>h</sup>. The variety of ways in which this is expressed, implies a far more personal belief, than the statements which we find among the Romans, and would put to shame almost every English manifesto, or the speeches put into the mouth of the Queen. They may have been, then, the more prepared to fear the prophecy of their destruction from the true God. Layard relates that he has "known a Christian priest frighten a whole Mussulman town to repentance, by proclaiming that he had a Divine mission to announce a coming earthquake or plague."<sup>i</sup>

These may have been predisposing causes. But the completeness of the repentance, not outward only, but inward, "turning from their evil way," is, in its extent, unexampled.

The fact rests on the authority of One greater than Jonah. Our Lord relates it as a fact. He contrasts people with people, the penitent heathen with the impenitent Jews, the inferior messenger who prevailed, with Himself, Whom His own received not. <sup>a</sup> The men of Nineveh shall rise up with this generation and shall condemn it, because they repented at the preaching of Jonas, and behold, a greater than Jonas is here.

The chief subject of the repentance of the Ninevites agrees also remarkably with their character. It is mentioned in the proclamation of the king and his nobles, "let them turn every one from his evil way and from the violence that is in their hands." Out of the whole catalogue of their sins, conscience singled out violence. This incidental notice, contained in the one word, exactly corresponds in substance with the fuller description in the Prophet Nahum, "Woe to the bloody city; it is all full of lies and robbery; the prey departeth not." <sup>m</sup> "The lion did tear in pieces enough for his whelps, and strangled for his lionesses, and filled his holes with prey and his dens with ravin." <sup>n</sup> "Upon whom hath not thy wickedness [ill-doing] passed continually?" "The Assyrian records," says Layard<sup>o</sup>, "are nothing but a dry register of military campaigns, spoiliations and cruelties."

The direction, that the animals also should be included in the common mourning, was according to the analogy of Eastern custom. When the Persian general Masistius fell at the battle of Plataea<sup>p</sup>, the "whole army and Mardonius above all, made a mourning, shaving themselves, and the horses, and the beasts of burden, amid surpassing wailing—Thus the Barbarians after their manner honoured Masistius on his death." Alexander imitated apparently the Persian custom in his mourning for Hephaestion<sup>q</sup>. The characteristic of the mourning in each case is, that they include the animals in that same mourning which they made themselves. The Ninevites had a right feeling, (as God Himself says) that the mercies of God were over man and beast<sup>r</sup>; and so they joined the beasts with themselves, hoping that the Creator of all would the rather have mercy on their common distress. <sup>s</sup> His tender mercies are over all His works: 'Thou, Lord, shalt save both man and beast.

The name of the king cannot yet be ascertained. But since this mission of Jonah fell in the later part of his prophetic office, and so probably in the latter part of the reign of Jeroboam or even later, the Assyrian king was probably Ivalush III. or the Pul of Holy Scripture. Jonah's human fears would, in that case, have been soon fulfilled. For Pul was the first Assyrian Monarch through whom Israel was weakened; and God had foreshewn by Amos that through the third it would be destroyed. Characteristic, on account of the earnestness which it implies, is the account that the men of Nineveh proclaimed the fast, before tidings reached the king himself. This is the plain meaning of the words; yet on account of the obvious difficulty they have been rendered, and word had come to the king<sup>t</sup>. The account is in harmony with that vast extent of the city, as of Babylon, of which <sup>u</sup> "the residents related that, after the outer portions of the city were taken, the inhabitants of the central part did not know that they were taken." It could scarcely have occurred to one who did not know the fact.

The history of Jonah, after God had spared Nineveh, has the same characteristic touches. He leaves his own character unexplained, its severity rebuked by God, unexcused and unpalliated. He had some special repugnance to be the messenger of mercy to the Ninevites. For this cause, he says to God, I fled before to Tarshish; for I knew that Thou art a merciful God, and repentest Thee of the evil. The circumstances of his time explain that repugnance. He had already been employed to prophesy the partial restoration of the boundaries of Israel. He was the contemporary of Hosea who foretold of his people, the ten tribes, they shall not dwell in the Lord's land, they shall eat unclean things in Assyria. God, in giving him his commission to go to Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, and cry against it, assigned as the reason, for its wickedness is come up before Me; words which to Jonah would suggest the memory of the wickedness of Sodom and its destruction. Jonah was a Prophet, but he was also an Israelite. He was commanded by God to call to repentance the capital of the country by which his own people, nay the people of his God, were to be carried captive. And he rebelled. We know more of the love of God than Jonah; for we have known the love of the Incarnation and the Redemption. And yet, were it made known to us, that some European or Asiatic people were to carry our own people captive out of our land, more than would be willing to confess it of themselves, (whatever sense they might have of the awfulness of God's judgments, and whatever feelings belonging to our common humanity,) would still inwardly rejoice to hear, that such a calamity as the earthquake at Lisbon befell its capital. It is the instinct of self-preservation and the implanted love of country. Jonah's murmuring related solely to God's mercy shewn to them as to this world. For the Ninevites had repented, and so were in the grace of God. The older of us remember what awful joy was felt when that three days' mortal strife at Leipzig at length was won, in which 107,000 were killed or wounded; or when out of 647,000 men who swept across Europe (a mass larger than the whole population of Nineveh) only "85,000 escaped; 125,000 were slain in battle, 132,000 perished by cold, fatigue and famine." A few years ago, how were Sebastopol and the Crimea in men's mouths, although that war is reputed to have cost the five nations involved in it 700,000 lives, more, probably, than all the inhabitants of Nineveh. Men forget or abstract themselves from all the individual sufferings, and think only of the result of the whole. A humane historian says of the battle of Leipzig, "a prodigious sacrifice, but one which, great as it was, humanity has no cause to regret, for it delivered Europe from French bondage, and the world from revolutionary aggression." He says on the Russian campaign of Napoleon I., "the faithful throughout Europe repeated the words of the Psalm, Efflavit Deus et dissipavit."

Look at Dr. Arnold's description of the issue of the Russian campaign. "Still the flood of the tide rose higher and higher, and every successive wave of its advance swept away a kingdom. Earthly state has never reached a prouder pinnacle, than when Napoleon in June, 1812, gathered his army at Dresden, that mighty host, unequalled in all time, of 450,000, not men merely but, effective soldiers, and there received the homage of subject kings. And now, what was the principal adversary of this tremendous power? by whom was it checked, resisted, and put down? By none, and by nothing but the direct and manifest interposition of God. I know no language so well fitted to describe the victorious advance to Moscow, and the utter humiliation of the retreat, as the language of the prophet with respect to the advance and subsequent destruction of the host of Sennacherib. When they arose early in the morning, behold they were all dead corpses, ap- plied almost literally to that memorable night of frost in which 20,000 horses perished, and the strength of the French army was utterly broken. Human instruments no doubt were employed in the remainder of the work, nor would I deny to Germany and to Russia the glories of that great year 1813, nor to England the honour of her victories in Spain or of the crowning victory of Waterloo. But at the distance of thirty years those who lived in the time of danger and remember its magnitude, and now calmly review what there was in human strength to avert it, must acknowledge, I think, beyond all controversy, that the deliverance of Europe from the dominion of Napoleon was effected neither by Russia nor by Germany nor by England, but by the hand of God alone." Jonah probably pictured to himself some sudden and almost painless destruction, which the word, overthrown, suggested, in which the whole city would be engulfed in an instant and the power which threatened his people, the people of God, broken at once. God reproved Jonah; but, before man condemn him, it were well to think, what is the prevailing feeling in Christian nations, at any signal calamity which befalls any people who threaten their own power or honour;—we cannot, in Christian times, say, their existence. "Jonah," runs an old traditional saying among the Jews, "sought the honour of the son [Israel], and sought not the honour of the Father."

An uninspired writer would doubtless at least have brought out the relieving points of Jonah's character, and not have left him under the unmitigated censure of God. Jonah tells the plain truth of himself, as S. Matthew relates his own desertion of his Lord among the Apostles, or S. Mark, under the guidance of S. Peter, relates the great fall of the great Apostle.

Amid this, Jonah remains the same throughout. It is one strong impetuous will, bent on having no share in that which was to bring destruction on his people, fearless of death and ready to give up his life. In the same mind he gives himself to death amid the storm, and, when his mission was accomplished, asks for death in the words of his great predecessor Elijah, when he fled from Jezebel. He probably justified his impatience to himself by the precedent of so great a prophet. But although he complains, he complains to God of Himself. Having complained, Jonah waits. It may be that he thought, although God did not execute His judgments on the 40th day, He might still fulfil them. He had been accustomed to the thought of the long-suffering of God, delaying even when He struck at last. "Considering with himself," says Theodorus, "the greatness of the threat, he imagined that something might perchance still happen even after this." The patience of God amid the Prophet's impatience, the still, gentle inquiry, (such as He often puts to the conscience now,) Doest thou well to be angry? and his final conviction of the Prophet out of his own feelings towards one of God's inanimate creatures, none would have ventured to picture, who had not known or experienced it.

In regard to the miracles in Jonah's history, over and above the fact, that they occur in Holy Scripture, we have our Lord's own word for their truth. He has set His seal on the whole of the Old Testament; He has directly authenticated by His own Divine authority the physical miracle of Jonah's preservation for three days and nights in the belly of the fish, and the yet greater moral miracle of the conversion of the Ninevites. He speaks of them both, as facts, and of the stay of Jonah in the fish's belly, as a type of His own stay in the heart of the earth. He speaks of it also as a miraculous sign.

The Scribes and Pharisees, unable to answer His refutation of their blasphemy, imputing His miracles to Beelzebub, asked of Him a miraculous sign<sup>1</sup> from Heaven. Probably, they meant to ask that one sign, for which they were always craving. Confounding His first Coming with His second, and interpreting, according to their wishes, of His first Coming all which the prophets foretold of the Second, they were ever looking out for that His Coming in glory with the clouds of heaven<sup>1</sup>, to humble, as they thought, their own as well as His enemies. Our Lord answers, that this their craving for a sign was part of their faithlessness. An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign: and there shall no sign be given them, but the sign of the Prophet Jonas. He uses three times their own word sign. He speaks of a miraculous sign, the sign of Jonas, a miracle which was the sign of something beyond itself. <sup>1</sup> For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. He gave them the sign from earth, not from Heaven; a miracle of humility, not of glory; of deliverance from death, and, as it were, a resurrection. A sign, such as Holy Scripture speaks of, need not at all times be a miraculous, but it is always a real sign. Isaiah and his sons, by real names, given to them by God, or the prophet by his walking barefoot, or Ezekiel by symbolic acts, were signs; not by miraculous but still by real acts. In this case, the Jews asked for a miraculous sign; our Lord promises them a miraculous sign, although not one such as they wished for, or which would satisfy them; a miraculous sign, of which the miraculous preservation of Jonah was a type. Our Lord says, <sup>1</sup> Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, and no one who really believes in Him, dare think that he was not.

It is perhaps a part of the simplicity of Jonah's narrative, that he relates these great miracles, as naturally as he does the most ordinary events. To God nothing is great or small; and the Prophet, deeply as he feels God's mercy, relates the means which God employed, as if it had been one of those every day miracles of His power and love, of which men think so little because God worketh them every day.

God prepared a great fish, he says, God prepared a palm-christ; God prepared a worm; God prepared a vehement East wind. Whether Jonah relates God's ordinary or His extraordinary workings, His workings in the way in which He upholdeth in being the creatures of His Will, or in a way which involves a miracle, i. e. God's acting in some unusual way, Jonah relates it in the same way, with the same simplicity of truth. His mind is fixed on God's Providence, and he relates God's acts, as they bore upon God's Providential dealings with him. He tells of God's preparing the East Wind which smote the palmchrist, in the same way in which he speaks of the supernatural growth of the palmchrist, or of God's Providence, in appointing that the fish should swallow him. He mentions this, which was in the order of God's Providence; he nowhere stops to tell us the "how." How God converted the Ninevites, how He sustained his life in the fish's belly, he tells not. He mentions only the great facts themselves, and leaves them in their mysterious greatness.

It is not strange, the heathen scoffers fixed upon the physical miracles in the history of Jonah for their scorn. They could have no appreciation of the great moral miracle of the conversion of a whole Heathen city at the voice of a single unknown Prophet. Such a conversion is unexampled in the whole revelation of God to man, greater in its immediate effects than the miracle of the Day of Pentecost. Before this stupendous power of God's grace over the unruly will of savage, yet educated, men, the physical miracles, great as they are, shrink into nothing. The wielding and swaying of half a million of human wills, and turning them from Satan to God, is a power of grace, as much above and beyond all changes of the unresisting physical creation, as the spirits and intelligences which God has created are higher than insentient matter. Physical miracles are a new-exercise of the creative power of God: the moral miracles were a sort of first-fruit of the re-creation of the Gentile world. Physical miracles were the simple exercise of the Will of God; the moral miracles were, in these hundreds of thousands, His overpowering grace, pouring itself into the heart of rebellious man and re-creating it. As many souls as there were, so many miracles were there, greater even than the creation of man.

The miracles too are in harmony with the nature around. The Hebrews, who were, at this time, not a maritime people, scarcely knew probably of those vast monsters, which our manifold researches into God's animal kingdom have laid open to us. Jonah speaks only of a great fish. The Greek word<sup>m</sup>, by which the LXX translated it, and which our Lord used, is, (like our "cetacea" which is taken from it,) the name of a genus, not of any individual fish. It is the equivalent of the great fish of Jonah. The Greeks use the adjective<sup>n</sup>, as we do, but they also use the substantive which occurs in S. Matthew. This designates a class which includes the whale, but is never used to designate the whale. In Homer<sup>o</sup>, it includes "dolphins and the dog." In the natural historians, (as Aristotle<sup>p</sup>), it designates the whole class of sea-creatures which are viviparous, "as the dolphin, the seal, the whale;" Galen<sup>q</sup> adds the Zygæna (a shark) and large tunnies; Photius says that "the Careharias," or white shark, "is a species of it;" Oppian<sup>r</sup> recounts, as belonging to the Cete, several species of sharks<sup>t</sup> and whales<sup>u</sup>, some with names of land animals<sup>v</sup>, and also the black tunnies<sup>w</sup>. Ælian enumerates most of these under the same head<sup>x</sup>. Our Lord's words then would be rendered more literally, in the fish's belly<sup>y</sup>, than in the whale's belly. Infidels seized eagerly on the fact of the narrowness of the whale's throat; their cavil applied only to an incorrect rendering of modern versions. Fish, of such size that they can swallow a man whole, and which are so formed as naturally to swallow their prey whole, have been found in the Mediterranean. The white shark, having teeth merely incisive, has no choice, except between swallowing its prey whole, or cutting off a portion of it. It cannot hold its prey, or swallow it piecemeal. Its voracity leads it to swallow at once all which it can<sup>b</sup>. Hence Otto Fabricius relates<sup>c</sup>, "its wont is to swallow down dead and, sometimes also, living men, which it finds in the sea."

A natural historian of repute relates<sup>d</sup>, "In 1758 in stormy weather a sailor fell overboard from a frigate in the Mediterranean. A shark was close by, which, as he was swimming and crying for help, took him in his wide throat, so that he forthwith disappeared. Other sailors had leapt into the sloop, to help their comrade, while yet swimming; the captain had a gun which stood on the deck discharged at the fish, which struck it so, that it cast out the sailor which it had in its throat, who was taken up, alive and little injured, by the sloop which had now come up. The fish was harpooned, taken up on the frigate, and dried. The captain made a present of the fish to the sailor who, by God's Providence, had been so wonderfully preserved. The sailor went round Europe exhibiting it. He came to Franconia, and it was publicly exhibited here in Erlangen, as also at Nurnberg and other places. The dried fish was delineated. It was 20 feet long, and, with expanded fins, nine feet wide, and weighed 3924 pounds. From all this, it is probable that this was the fish of Jonah."

This is by no means an insulated account of the size of this fish. Blumenbach<sup>a</sup> states, "the white shark, or Canis carcharias, is found of the size of 10,000 lbs, and horses have been found whole in its stomach." A writer of the 16th century on "the fish of Marseilles" says, "they of Nice attested to me, that they had taken a fish of this sort, approaching to 4000 lbs weight, in whose body they had found a man whole. Those of Marseilles told something similar, that they had once taken a Lamia (so they still popularly call the Carcharias) and found in it a man in a coat of mail [loricated.]" Rondelet says, "sometimes it grows to such size, that, placed on a carriage, it can hardly be drawn by two horses. I have seen one of moderate size, which weighed 1000 lbs, and, when disembowelled and cut to pieces, it had to be put on two carriages." "I have seen on the shore of Saintonge a Lamia, whose mouth and throat were of such vast size, that it would easily swallow a large man."

Richardson<sup>b</sup>, speaking of the whiteshark in N. America, says that they attain the length of 30 feet, i. e. a 3rd larger than that which swallowed the sailor whole. Laccpède speaks of fish of this kind as "more than 30 feet long." "The contour," he adds<sup>c</sup>, "of the upper jaw of a requin of 30 feet, is about 6 feet long; its swallow is of a diameter proportionate."

"In all modern works on Zoology, we find 30 feet given as a common length for a shark's body. Now a shark's body is usually only about eleven times the length of the half of its lower jaw. Consequently a shark of 30 feet would have a lower jaw of nearly six feet in its semicircular extent. Even if such a jaw as this was of hard bony consistence instead of a yielding cartilaginous nature, it would qualify its possessor for engulfing one of our own species most easily. The power which it has, by virtue of its cartilaginous skeleton, of stretching bending and yielding, enables us to understand how the shark can swallow entire animals as large or larger than ourselves. Such an incident is related to have occurred A.D. 1802, on the authority of a Captain Brown, who found the body of a woman entire with the exception of the head within the stomach of a shark killed by him at Surinam."

In the Mediterranean there are traces of a yet larger race, now extinct. "However large or dangerous the existing race may be, yet from the magnitude of the fossil teeth found in Malta and elsewhere, some of which measure 4½ inches from the point to the base, and 6 inches from the point to the angle, the animal, to which they belonged, must have much exceeded the present species in size." "The mouth of a fish of this sort," says Bloch<sup>d</sup>, "is armed with 400 teeth of this kind. In the Isle of Malta and in Sicily, their teeth are found in great numbers on the shore. Naturalists of old took them for tongues of serpents. They are so compact that, after having remained for many centuries in the earth, they are not yet decayed. The quantity and size of those which are found proves that these creatures existed formerly in great numbers, and that some were of extraordinary size. If one were to calculate from them what should, in proportion, be the size of the throat which should hold such a number of such teeth, it ought to be at least 8 or 10 feet wide. In truth, these fish are found to this day of a terrific size.—This fish, celebrated for its voracity and courage, is found in the Mediterranean and in almost every Ocean. It generally keeps at the bottom, and rises only to satisfy its hunger. It is not seen near shore, except when it pursues its prey, or is pursued by the mular<sup>e</sup>, which it does not venture to approach, even when dead. It swallows all sorts of aquatic animals, alive or dead, and pursues especially the sea-calf and the tunny. In its pursuit of the tunny, it sometimes falls into nets, and some have been thus taken in Sardinia, which weighed 400 lbs and in which 8 or 10 tunnies were found still undigested. It attacks men wherever it can find them, whence the Germans call it 'menschen-fresser' (men-eater.) Gunner<sup>f</sup> speaks of a sea-calf 'of the size of an ox, which had also been found in one of these animals; and in another a reindeer without horns, which had fallen from a rock.' This fish attains a length of 25-30 feet. Müller<sup>g</sup> says that one was taken near the Island of St. Marguerite which weighed 1500 lbs. On opening it, they found in it a horse, quite whole; which had apparently been thrown overboard. M. Brünniche says<sup>h</sup> that during his residence at Marseilles, one was taken near that city, 15 feet long, and that two years before, two, much larger, had been taken, in one of which had been found two tunnies and a man quite dressed. The fish were injured, the man not at all. In 1760 there was exhibited at Berlin a requin stuffed, 20 feet long, and 9 in circumference, where it was thickest. It had been taken in the Mediterranean. Its voracity is so great, that it does not spare its own species. Leem<sup>i</sup> relates, that a Laplander, who had taken a requin, fastened it to his canoe; soon after, he missed it. Some time after, having taken a larger, he found in its stomach the requin which he had lost." "The large Australian shark (Carcharias glaucus), which has been measured after death 37 feet long, has teeth about 2½ inches long."

Such facts ought to shame those who speak of the miracle of Jonah's preservation through the fish, as a thing less credible than any other of God's miraculous doings. There is no greater or less Omnipotence. The creation of the Universe, the whole stellar system, or of a fly, are alike to Him, simple acts of His Divine Will. He spake, and it was. What to men measures of these teeth, and estimates of the size of the animal to which they belonged. His specimens are from Suffolk, from the Red Crng, where sharks' teeth, of several sorts, and a vast variety of shells, corals, &c. are mixed with some remains of mostly extinct mammalia. The marine races are also for the most part of extinct kinds. These deposits in Suffolk and Malta are of the later Tertiary period; specimens derived from them may be found on the shores no doubt, but there is also no doubt of their original situation being in the stratified earth-crust. The living sharks to which the fossil animal may have most nearly approached are included in the genus Carcharias, the teeth being beautifully serrated on the edges." <sup>a</sup> Stark, Animal kingdom, p. 305. <sup>b</sup> Hist. des Poissons, iv. 31. § xi. <sup>c</sup> Physeter Macrocephalus, Linn. seem the greatest miracles or the least, are alike to Him, the mere Let it be of His All-Holy Will, acting in a different way for one and the same end, the instruction of the intelligent creatures which He has made. Each and all subserve, in their several places and occasions, the same end of the manifold Wisdom of God. Each and all of these, which to us seem interruptions of His ordinary workings in nature, were from the beginning, before He had created anything, as much a part of His Divine purpose, as the creation of the Universe. They are not disturbances of His laws. Night does not disturb day which it closes, nor day night. No more does any work which God, before the creation of the world, willed to do, (for, 'known unto God are all His ways from the beginning of the world,') interfere with any other of His workings. His workings in nature, and His workings above nature, form one harmonious whole. Each are a part of His ways; each is essential to the manifestation of God to us. That wonderful order and symmetry of God's creation exhibits to us some effluences of the Divine Wisdom and Beauty and Power and Goodness; that regularity itself sets forth those other foreknown operations of God, whereby He worketh in a way different from His ordinary mode of working in nature. "They who know not God, will ask," says S. Cyril<sup>a</sup>, "how was Jonah preserved in the fish? how was he not consumed? how did he endure that natural heat, and live, surrounded by such moisture, and was not rather digested? For this poor body is very weak and perishable. Truly wonderful was it, surpassing reason and wontedness. But if God be declared its Author, who would any more disbelieve? For God is All-powerful, and transmouldeth easily the nature of things which are, to what He willeth, and nothing resisteth His ineffable Will. For that which is perishable can at His Will easily become superior to corruption; and what is firm and unshaken and undecaying is easily subjected thereto. For nature, I deem, to the things which be, is, what seemeth good to the Creator." S. Augustine well points out the inconsistency, so common now, of excepting to the one or the other miracle, upon grounds which would in truth apply to many or to all. "The answer" to the mockery of the Pagans, "is that either all Divine miracles are to be disbelieved, or there is no reason why this should not be believed. For we should not believe in Christ Himself that He rose on the third day, if the faith of the Christians shrank from the mockery of Pagans. Since our friend does not put the question, Is it to be believed that Lazarus rose on the 4th day, or Christ Himself on the third day, I much marvel that he put this as to Jonah as a thing incredible, unless he think it easier for one dead to be raised from the tomb, than to be preserved alive in that vast belly of the fish. Not to mention how vast the size of marine creatures is said to be by those who have witnessed it, who could not conceive what numbers of men that stomach could contain which was fenced by those ribs, well known to the people at Carthage, where they were set up in public?—how vast must have been the opening of that mouth, the door, as it were, to that cave." "But, troth, they have found in a Divine miracle something which they need not believe; viz. that the gastric juice whereby food is digested could be so tempered as not to injure the life of man. How still less credible would they deem it, that those three men, cast into the furnace by the impious king, walked up and down in the midst of the fire! If then they refuse to believe any miracles of God, they must be answered in another way. But they ought not to question any one, as though it were incredible, but at once all which are as, or even more, marvellous. He who proposed these questions, let him be a Christian now, lest, while he waits first to finish the questions on the sacred books, he come to the end of his life, before he have passed from death to life.—Let him, if he will, first ask questions such as he asked concerning Christ, and those few great questions to which the rest are subordinate. But if he think to finish all such questions as this of Jonah, before he becomes a Christian, he little appreciates human mortality or his own. For they are countless; not to be finished before accepting the faith, lest life be finished without faith. But, retaining the faith, they are subjects for the diligent study of the faithful; and what in them becomes clear is to be communicated without arrogance, what still lies hid, to be borne without risk to salvation."

The other physical miracle of the rapid production of the Palma Christi, which God created to overshadow Jonah, was plainly supernatural in that extreme rapidity of growth, else in conformity with the ordinary character of that plant. "The kikaion, as we read in the Hebrew, called kikeia [or, Elkerœa<sup>c</sup>,] in Syriac and Punic," says S. Jerome<sup>d</sup>, "is a shrub with broad leaves like vine-leaves. It gives a very dense shade, supports itself on its own stem. It grows most abundantly in Palestine, especially in sandy spots. If you cast the seed into the ground, it is soon quickened, rises marvellously into a tree, and a few days what you had beheld a herb, you look up to, a shrub.—The kikaion, a miracle in its instantaneous existence, and an instance of the power of God in the protection given by this living shade, followed the course of its own nature." It is a native of all North Africa, Arabia, Syria, India. In the valley of the Jordan it still grows to a "large size, and has the character," an eyewitness writes<sup>e</sup>, "of a perennial tree, although usually described as a biennial plant." "It is of the size of a small fig-tree. It has leaves like a plane, only larger, smoother, and darker." The name of the plant is of Egyptian origin, kiki; which Dioscorides and Galen identify with the croton<sup>f</sup>; Herodotus with the Silicyprian<sup>g</sup>, which, in the form seselicyprian, Dioscorides mentions as a name given to the kiki or croton<sup>h</sup>; Pliny<sup>i</sup> with the Ricinus also (the Latin name for the croton), our Palma Christi; Hebrews<sup>k</sup> with the Arabic Elkerœa, which again is known to be the Ricinus. The growth and occasional perishing of the Palma Christi have both something analogous to the growth and decay related in Jonah. Its rapidity of growth is remarked by S. Jerome and Pliny, who says, "in Spain it shoots up rapidly, of the height of an olive, with hollow stem," and branches<sup>l</sup>.

"All the species of the Ricinus shoot up quickly, and yield fruit within three months, and are so multiplied from the seed shed, that, if left to themselves, they would occupy in short space the whole country." In Jamaica, "it grows with surprising rapidity to the height of 15 or 16 feet." Niebuhr says<sup>m</sup>, Mishnah Shabbath, c. 2. to be used for lights on the sabbath) is the kikaion of Jonah, (Kim.) "The oil of Kik" is the ῥαίων κίκωνος of Galen (Lex. S. p. 918) which Ibn Baithar uses to translate the kiki, κροτόν (Boch. Hieroz. ii. 24). R. Nathan, Maimonides on Tr. Shabbath, c. 2. n. 1, and "some" in Bartenora, (Ib.) also explain it of the kerœa. R. Bar Bar Channach, (early 3rd cent. Wolf, ib. 880. coll. 879) identifies it with the Zelulibah (Kim.) which again is explained to be the Elkerœa<sup>o</sup> (respons. Geonim in Boch. Hieroz. ii. 24. p. 42. ed. Jerome had meant that the "Syriac" word was the same, one should have thought that he would have said so. The Peabito has probably been corrupted out of the LXX.

"it has the appearance of a tree. Each branch of the kheroa has only one leaf, with 6, 7, or 8 indentures. This plant was near a stream which watered it adequately. At the end of Oct. 1765, it had, in 5 months, grown about 8 feet, and bore, at once, flowers and fruit, green and ripe." This rapidity of growth has only a sort of likeness to the miracle, which quickened in a way far above nature the powers implanted in nature. The destruction may have been altogether in the way of nature, except that it happened at that precise moment, when it was to be a lesson to Jonah. "On warm days, when a small rain falls, black caterpillars are generated in great numbers on this plant, which, in one night, so often and so suddenly cut off its leaves, that only their bare ribs remain, which I have often observed with much wonder, as though it were a copy of that destruction of old at Nineveh." The Ricinus of India and Assyria furnishes food to a different caterpillar from that of Amboyna<sup>a</sup>, but the account illustrates the rapidity of the destruction. The word "worm" is elsewhere also used collectively, not of a single worm only<sup>a</sup>, and of creatures which, in God's appointment, devour the vine<sup>c</sup>. There is nothing in the text, implying that the creature was one which gnawed the stem rather than the leaves. The peculiar word, smote<sup>b</sup>, is probably used, to correspond with the mention of the sun smiting<sup>d</sup> on the head of Jonah.

These were miracles, like all the other miracles of Scripture, ways, in which God made Himself and His power known to us, shewing Himself the Lord of that nature which men worshipped and worship, for the present conversion of a great people, for the conviction of Israel, a hidden prophecy of the future conversion of the heathen, and an example of repentance and its fruits to the end of time. They have no difficulty except to the rebelliousness of unbelief.

Other difficulties people have made for themselves. In a plank-roofed booth such as ours, Jonah would not have needed the shadow of a plant. Obviously then, Jonah's booth, even if we knew not what it was, was not like our's. A German critic has chosen to treat this as an absurdity. "Although Jonah makes himself a shady booth, he still further needs the overshadowing kikaion." Jonah however, being an Israelite, made booths, such as Israel made them. Now we happen to know that the Jewish succah, or booth, being formed of the interlaced branches of trees, did not exclude the sun. We know this from the rules in the Talmud as to the construction of the Succah or "tabernacle" for the feast of Tabernacles. It lays down<sup>e</sup>, "A Succah whose height is not ten palms, and which has not three sides, and which has more sun than shade [i.e. more of whose floor is penetrated by light through the top of the Succah, than is left in shade], is profane." And again<sup>f</sup>, "Whoso spreadeth a linen cloth over the Succah, to protect him from the sun, it is profane." "Whoso raiseth above it the vine or gourd or ivy, and so covers it, it is profane; but if the roof be larger than they, or if one cut them, they are lawful." "With bundles of straw, and bundles of wood, and bundles of faggots, they do not cover it; and all these, if undone, are lawful." "They cover it with planks according to R. Jonah; and R. Meir forbids; whoso putteth upon it one plank of four palms' breadth it is lawful, only he must not sleep under it." Yet all held<sup>g</sup> that a plank thus broad was to overlap the booth, in which case it would not cover it. The principle of all these rules is, that the rude hut, in which they dwelt during the feast of Tabernacles, was to be a shade, symbolising God's overshadowing them in the wilderness; the Succah itself, not any thing adscititious, was to be their shade; yet it was but an imperfect protection, and was indeed intended so to be, in order to symbolise their pilgrim-state. Hence the contrivances among those who wished to be at ease, to protect themselves; and hence the inconvenience which God turned into an instruction to Jonah. Even "the Arabs," Layard tells us<sup>b</sup> in a Nineveh summer, "struck their black tents and lived in sheds, constructed of reeds and grass along the banks of the river." "The heats of summer made it impossible to live in a white tent." Layard's resource of a "recess, cut into the bank of the river where it rose perpendicularly from the water's edge, screening the front with reeds and boughs of trees, and covering the whole with similar materials," corresponds with the hut of Jonah, covered by the Kikaion.

No heathen seoffer, as far as we know, when he became acquainted with the history of Jonah, likened it to any heathen fable. This was reserved for so-called Christians. Some heathen mocked at it, as the philosophers of Mars'-hill mocked at the resurrection of Christ<sup>c</sup>. "This sort of question" [about Jonah], said a heathen, who professed to be an enquirer, "I have observed to be met with broad mockery by the pagans<sup>d</sup>." They mocked, but they did not insult the history by likening it to any fable of their own. S. Jerome, who mentions incidentally that "Joppa is the place in which, to this day, rocks are pointed out in the shore, where Andromeda, being bound, was once on a time freed by the help of Perseus," does not seem aware that the fable could be brought into any connection with the history of Jonah. He urges on the heathen the inconsistency of believing their own fables, which besides their marvellousness were often immoral, and refusing to believe the miracles of Scripture histories; but the fable of Andromeda or of Hesione do not even occur to him in this respect. "I am not ignorant that to some it will seem incredible that a man could be preserved alive 3 days and nights in the fish's belly. These must be either believers or unbelievers. If believers, they must needs believe much greater things, how the three youths, cast into the burning fiery furnace, were in such sort unharmed, that not even the smell of fire touched their dress; how the sea retired, and stood on either side rigid like walls, to make a way for the people passing over; how the rage of lions, aggravated by hunger, looked, awestricken, on its prey, and touched it not, and many like things. Or if they be unbelievers, let them read the 15 books of Ovid's metamorphoses, and all Greek and Latin story, and there they will see—where the foulness of the fables precludes the holiness of a divine origin. These things they believe, and that to God all things are possible. Believing foul things, and defending them by alleging the unlimited power of God, they do not admit the same power as to things moral." In Alexandria and in the time of S. Cyril, the old heathen fables were tricked up again. He alludes then to Lycophrone's version of the story of Hercules<sup>e</sup>, in order, like S. Jerome, to point out the inconsistency of believing heathen fables and rejecting Divine truth. "We," he says, "do not use their fables to confirm things Divine, but we mention them to a good end, in answer to unbelievers, that their received histories too do not reject such relations." The philosophers wished at once to defend their own fables and to attack the Gospel. Yet it was an unhappy argumentum ad hominem. Modern infidelity would find a likeness, where there is no shadow of it. The two heathen fables had this in common; that, in order to avert the anger of the gods, a virgin was exposed to be devoured by a sea-monster, and delivered from death by a hero, who slew the monster and married the princess whom he delivered. This, as given by S. Cyril, was a form of the fable, long subsequent to Jonah. The original simple form of the story was this, "Apollo and Poseidon, wishing to make trial of the insolence of Laomedon, appearing in the likeness of men, promised for a consideration to fortify Pergamus. When they had fortified it, he did not pay them their hire. Wherefore Apollo sent a pestilence, and Poseidon a sea-monster, cast on shore by the flood-tide, who made havock of the men that were in the plain. The oracle said that they should be freed from these misfortunes, if Laomedon would set his daughter Hesione as food for the monster; he did so set her, binding her to the rocks near to the plain; Hercules, seeing her thus exposed, promised to save her, if he might have from Laomedon the horses, which Zeus had given in compensation for the rape of Ganymede. Laomedon saying that he would give them, he slew the monster and set Hesione free."

The story of Andromeda is told by Apollodorus<sup>7</sup>, in part in the very same words. The Nereids were angered by Cassiope the mother of Andromeda, for boasting herself more beautiful than they. Then follows the same history, Poseidon sending a flood-tide and a sea-monster; the same advice of the oracle; the setting Andromeda in chains, as food for the sea-monster; Perseus' arrival, bargain with the father, the killing of the sea-monster, the deliverance of Andromeda. Fable as all this is, it does not seem to have been meant to be fable. Pliny relates, "M. Scaurus, when Ædile, exhibited at Rome, among other marvels, the bones of the monster to which Andromeda was said to have been exposed, which bones were brought from Joppa, a city of Judæa, being 40 feet long, in height greater than the ribs of the Indian elephant, and the vertebra a foot and a half thick." He describes Joppa as "seated on a hill, with a projecting rock, in which they shew the traces of the chains of Andromeda." Josephus says the same<sup>8</sup>. Pausanias relates, "the country of the Hebrews near Joppa supplies water blood-red, very near the sea. The natives tell, that Perseus, when he had slain the monster to which the daughter of Cepheus was exposed, washed off the blood there." Mela, following perhaps his Greek authority<sup>9</sup>, speaks in the present<sup>10</sup>, "an illustrious trace of the preservation of Andromeda by Perseus, they shew vast bones of a sea-monster."

But, whether the authors of these fables meant them for matters of fact, or whether the fables had any symbolical meaning, they have not, in any form which they received until long after the time of Jonah, any connection with the book of Jonah.

The history of Andromeda has in common with the book of Jonah, this only, that, whereas Apollodorus and the ancients<sup>11</sup> placed the scene of her history in Æthiopia, writers who lived some centuries after the time of Jonah removed it to Joppa, the seaport whence Jonah took ship. "There are some," says Strabo<sup>12</sup>, speaking of his own day, "who transfer Æthiopia to our Phœnicia, and say that the matters of Andromeda took place at Joppa; and this, not out of ignorance of places, but rather in the form of a myth." The transfer, doubtless, took place in the 800 years which elapsed between Jonah and Strabo, and was occasioned perhaps by the peculiar idolatry of the coast, the worship of Atargatis or Derceto. Pliny, at least, immediately after that statement about the chains of Andromeda at Joppa, subjoins, "The fabulous Ceto is worshipped there." Ceto is doubtless the same as "Derceto," of which Pliny uses the same epithet a little afterwards<sup>13</sup>. "There," at Hierapolis, "is worshipped the prodigious Atargatis, which the Greeks call Derceto." The Greeks appear (as their way was), on occasion of this worship of Ceto, to have transferred here their own story of Andromeda and the Cetos.

Ceto, i. e. Derceto, and Dagon were the corresponding male and female deities, under whose names the Philistines worshipped the power which God has implanted in nature to reproduce itself. Both were fish-forms, with human hands and face. Derceto or Atargatis was the Syrian Ter'to, whose worship at Hierapolis or Mabug had a far-known infamy, the same altogether as that of Rhea or Cybele<sup>14</sup>. The maritime situation of Philistia probably led them to adopt the fish as the symbol of prolific reproduction. In Holy Scripture we find chiefly the worship of the male god Dagon, lit. "great fish." He had temples at Gaza<sup>15</sup>, and Ashdod<sup>16</sup>, whither all the lords of the Philistines assembled. Five other places are named from his worship, four near the sea coast, and one close to Joppa itself<sup>17</sup>. But in later times the name of the goddess became more prominent, and, among the Greeks, exclusive. Atargatis or Derceto had, in the time of the Maccabees, a celebrated temple at Carnion<sup>18</sup>, i. e. Ashteroth Carnaim in Gilead, and, according to Pliny, at Joppa itself. This furnished an easy occasion to the Greeks to transfer thither their story of the Cetos. The Greeks had peopled Joppa<sup>19</sup>, before Simon retook it from Antiochus. In Jonah's time, it was Phœnician. It was not colonised by Greeks until 5 centuries later. Since then Andromeda is a Greek story which they transferred to Joppa with themselves, the existence of the Greek story, at a later date, can be no evidence for "a Phœnician legend," of which the rationalists have dreamed, nor can it have any connection with Jonah who lived half a millennium before the Greeks came, eight hundred years before the story is mentioned in connection with Joppa.

With regard to the fables of Hercules, Diodorus Siculus thought that there was a basis of truth in them. The story of Hercules and Hesione, as alluded to by Homer and told by Apollodorus, looks like an account of the sea breaking in upon the land and wasting it; a human sacrifice on the point of being offered, and prevented by the removal of the evil through the building of a sea-wall. Gigantic works were commonly attributed to superior agency, good or evil. In Homer, the men-

the celebrity of this dreadful worship; among the Syrians S. James of Sarug attests its prevalence in Haran (Ass. B. O. i. 328.) and Bardsanes, in Syria generally with its special enormities. (in Cureton, Spicil. Syr. p. 32 Syr. p. 20 Gr.) Diodorus Sic. [ii. 4.] mentions the woman's face and fish-body of Derceto. <sup>13</sup> Judg. xvi. 23. <sup>14</sup> I Sam. v. 1. 1 Macc. x. 83, xi. 4. <sup>15</sup> 1 Bethdagon ("temple of Dagon") in the S. (Hist. v. 2.) Ovid still placed the scene in Æthiopia. (Met. iv. 608.) and ascribed the Oracle to Ammon. (670.) <sup>16</sup> i. 2. 85. ed. tion of the sea-wall is prominent. "He led the way to the lofty wall of mounded earth of the divine Hercules, which the Trojans and Minerva made for him, that, eluding the sea-monster, he might escape, when he rushed at him from the beach towards the plain." In any case a monster, which came up from the sea and wasted the land, is no fish; nor has the story of one who destroyed such a monster, any bearing on that of one whose life God preserved by a fish. Nor is the likeness really mended by the later version of the story, originating in an Alexandrian<sup>h</sup>, after the book of Jonah had been translated into Greek at Alexandria. The writer of the Cassandra, who lived at least five centuries after Jonah, represents Hercules as "a lion, the offspring of three nights, which aforetime the jagged-toothed dog of Triton lapped up in his jaws; and he, a living carver of his entrails, scorched by the steam of a cauldron on the fireless hearths, shed the bristles of his head upon the ground, the infanticide waster of my country." In that form the story re-appears in a heathen philosopher<sup>i</sup> and an Alexandrian father<sup>j</sup>, but, in both, as borrowed from the Alexandrian poet. Others, who were unacquainted with Lycophron, heathen<sup>k</sup> and Christian<sup>l</sup> alike, knew nothing of it. One Christian writer, at the end of the 5th century<sup>m</sup>, a Platonic philosopher, gives an account, distinct from any other, heathen or Christian, probably confused from both. In speaking of marvellous deliverances, he says; "As Hercules too is sung" [i. e. in Greek poetry], "when his ship was broken, to have been swallowed up by a ketos, and, having come within, was preserved." In the midst of the 11th century after our Lord, some writers on Greek fable, in order to get rid of the very offensive story of the conception of Hercules, interpreted the word of Lycophron which alludes to it, of his employing, in the destruction of the monster, three periods of 24 hours, called "nights" from the darkness in which he was enveloped. Truly, full often have those words of God been fulfilled, that men shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables. Men, who refused to believe the history of Jonah, although attested by our Lord, considered Aeneas Gazæus, who lived about 13 centuries after Jonah, to be an authentic witness of an imaginary Phœnician tradition<sup>n</sup>, 13 centuries before his own time; and that, simply on the ground that he has his name from Gaza; whereas he expressly refers, not to Phœnician tradition but to Greek poetry.

Such are the stories, which became a traditional argument among unbelieving critics<sup>r</sup> to justify their disbelief in miracles accredited by our Lord. Flimsy spider-webs, which a critic of the same school brushes away<sup>s</sup>, as soon as he has found some other expedient, as flimsy, to serve his purpose! The majestic simplicity of Holy Scripture and its moral greatness stand out the more, in contrast with the unmeaning fables, with which men have dared, amid much self-applause, to compare it. A more earnest, but misled, mind, even while unhappily disbelieving the miracle of Jonah, held the comparison, on ground of "reason, ludicrous; but not the less frivolous and irreverent, as applied to Holy Scripture<sup>t</sup>."

It was assumed by those who first wrote against the book of Jonah, that the thanksgiving in it was later than Jonah, "a cento from the Psalms." They objected that it did not allude to the history of Jonah. One critic repeated after the other<sup>u</sup>, that the Psalm was a "mere cento" of Psalms. However untrue, nothing was less doubted. A later critic felt that the Psalm must have been the thanksgiving of one delivered from great peril of life in the sea. "The images," he says<sup>v</sup>, "are too definite, they relate too exclusively to such a situation, to admit of being understood vaguely of any great peril to life, as may Psalms 18 and 42, (which the writer may have had in his mind) or Psalm 124." Another, to whom attention has been recently drawn, maintained the early date of the thanksgiving, and held that it contained so much of the first part of Jonah's history, that that history might be founded on the thanksgiving<sup>w</sup>. This was one step backward towards the truth. It is admitted that the thanksgiving is genuine, is Jonah's, and relates to a real deliverance of the real Prophet. But the thanksgiving would not suggest the history<sup>x</sup>. Jonah thanks God for his deliverance from the depths of the sea, from which no man could be delivered, except by miracle. He describes himself, not as struggling with the waves, but as sunk beneath them to the bottom of the sea, whence no other ever rose<sup>y</sup>. Jonah does not tell God, how He had delivered him. Who does? He rehearses to God the hopeless peril, out of which He had delivered him. On this the soul dwells; for this is the ground of its thankfulness. The delivered soul loves to describe to God the death out of which it had been delivered. Jonah thanks God for one miracle; he gives no hint of the other, which, when he uttered the thanksgiving, was not yet completed. The thanksgiving bears witness to a miracle; but does not suggest its nature. The history supplies it.

It is instructive that the writer who, disbelieving the miracles in the book of Jonah, "restores his history"<sup>z</sup> by effacing them, has also to "restore the history"<sup>aa</sup> of the Saviour of the world, by omitting His testimony to them. But this is to subject the revelation of God to the variations of the mind of His creatures, believing what they like, disbelieving what they dislike.

<sup>a</sup> "What has the myth of Perseus, rightly understood, and with no foreign ingredients, in common with the history of Jonah, but the one circumstance, that a sea-creature is mentioned in each? And how different the meaning! Neither the myth of Perseus and Andromeda, nor the fully corresponding myth of Hercules and Hesione, can serve either to confirm the truth of the miracles in the book of Jonah" [as though the truth needed support from a fable], "nor to explain it as a popular heathen tradition, inasmuch as the analogy is too distant and indefinite to explain the whole. Unsatisfactory as such parallels are as soon as we look, not merely at incidental and secondary points, but at the central point to be compared," &c. Baur (in Illgen Zeitschr. 1837 p. 101.) followed by Hitzig. Winer also rejects it.

<sup>b</sup> "In classical philology we should simply add, 'to think this in earnest were ludicrous;' but not the less frivolous and irreverent," we may well add in the criticism of Scripture. The ode then did not suggest the fable (as Bunsen makes it), for it contains it. The Dolphin, playing as it does about vessels, was a Greek symbol of the sea; and the human figure upon it a votive offering for a safe arrival. Welcker gives 6 fables of persons, dead or alive, brought ashore by Dolphins. (Welcker, Kl. Schrift. i. 90, 1.) The symbol was turned by the fertile Greek into the myth. <sup>f</sup> Bunsen, in his Epitome of the thanksgiving, omitted the characteristic part of it, p. 364. <sup>g</sup> Bunsen, ib. 372. <sup>h</sup> Ib. 379

Schrift. i. 438-50) places the writer of the Cassandra not earlier than 190, B.C. on the ground of allusions to Roman greatness (1226-82, 1446-51.) which he thinks inconsistent in a friend of Ptolemy's. Welcker (die Griech. Trag. p. 1259-62) thinks both passages interpolated.

Excerpta Var. p. 274.). The Empress Eudocia (A.D. 1067, &c.) adds the new and false interpretation of τριπασπιον (Violet, in Villonson, Anecd. i. 344.), but also the old explanation (Ib. p. 211.). Our Lord Himself attested that this miracle on Jonah was an image of His own entombment and Resurrection. He has compared the preaching of Jonah with His own. He compares it as a real history, as He does the coming of the Queen of Sheba to hear the wisdom of Solomon. Modern writers have lost sight of the principle, that men, as individuals, amid their infirmities and sins, are but types of man; in their history alone, their office, their sufferings, can they be images of their Redeemer. God portrayed doctrines of the Gospel in the ritual of the law. Of the offices of Christ and, at times, His history, He gave some faint outline in offices which He instituted, or persons whose history He guided. But they are types only, in that which is of God. Even that which was good in any was no type of His goodness; nay, the more what is human is recorded of them, the less they are types of Him. Abraham who acted much, is a type, not of Christ, but of the faithful. Isaac, of whom little is recorded, except his sacrifice, becomes the type of Christ. Melchisedek, who comes forth once in that great loneliness, a King of Righteousness and of peace, a Priest of God, refreshing the father of the faithful with the sacrificial bread and wine, is a type, the more, of Christ's everlasting priesthood, in that he stands alone, without father, without known descent, without known beginning or end, majestic in his one office, and then disappearing from our sight. Joseph was a type of our Lord, not in his chastity or his personal virtues but in his history; in that he was rejected by his brethren, sold at the price of a slave, yet, with kingly authority, received, supported, pardoned, gladdened, feasted, his brethren who had sold him. Even so the history of Jonah had two aspects. It is, at once, the history of his mission and of his own personal conduct in it. These are quite distinct. The one is the history of God's doings in him and through him; the other is the account of his own soul, its rebellions, struggles, conviction. As a man, he is himself the penitent; as a Prophet, he is the preacher of repentance. In what was human infirmity in him, he was a picture of his people, whose cause he espoused with too narrow a zeal. Zealous too for the honour of God, although not with God's all-enfolding love, willing that that honour should be vindicated in his own way, unwilling to be God's instrument on God's terms, yet silenced and subdued at last, he was the image and lesson to those who murmured at S. Peter's mission to Cornelius, and who, only when they heard how God the Holy Ghost had come down upon Cornelius' household, held their peace and glorified God, saying, then hath God to the Gentiles also granted repentance unto life<sup>b</sup>. What coinciding visions to Cornelius and S. Peter, what evident miracles of power and of grace, were needed after the Resurrection to convince the Jewish converts of that same truth, which God made known to and through Jonah! The conversion of the Gentiles and the saving of a remnant only of the Jews are so bound together in the prophets, that it may be that the repugnance of the Jewish converts was founded on an instinctive dread of the same sort which so moved Jonah. It was a superhuman love, through which S. Paul contemplated their fall as the riches of the Gentiles<sup>c</sup>.

On the other hand, that, in which Jonah was an image of our Lord, was very simple and distinct. It was where Jonah was passive, where nothing of his own was mingled. The storm, the casting over of Jonah, were the works of God's Providence; his preservation through the fish was a miracle of God's power; the conversion of the Ninevites was a manifold miracle of His grace. It might have pleased God to send to convert a heathen people one whom He had not so delivered; or to have subdued the will of the Prophet whom He sent on some other mission. But now sign answers to sign, and mission shadows out mission. Jonah was first delivered from his three days' burial in that living tomb by a sort of resurrection, and then, whereas he had previously been a Prophet to Israel, he thenceforth became a Prophet to the heathen, whom, and not Israel, he converted, and, in their conversion, his, as it were, resurrection was operative. The correspondence is there. We may lawfully dwell on subordinate details, how man was tempest-tost and buffeted by the angry waves of this perilous and bitter world; Christ, as one of us, gave His life for our lives, the storm at once was hushed, there is a deep calm of inward peace, and our haven was secured. But the great outstanding facts, which our Lord Himself has pointed out, are, that he who had heretofore been the Prophet of Israel only, was, after a three days' burial, restored through miracle to life, and then the heathen were converted. Our Lord has set His seal upon the facts. They were to Israel a sacred enigma, a hidden prophecy, waiting for their explanation. They were a warning, how those on whom God then seemed not to have pity, might become the object of His pity, while they themselves were cast out. Now the marvellous correspondence is, even on the surface, a witness to the miracle. Centuries before our Lord came, there was the history of life preserved by miracle in death and out of death; and thereupon the history of heathen converted to God and accepted by Him. Is this, even a doubting mind might ask, accidental coincidence? or are it and the other like resemblances, the tracing of the finger of God, from Whom is all harmony, Who blends in one all the gradations of His creation, all the lineaments of history, His natural and His moral world, the shadow of the law with the realities of the Gospel? How should such harmony exist, but for that harmonising Hand, Who "binds and blends in one" the morning and evening of His creation?

CHAPTER I.

1 Jonah, sent to Nineveh, fleeth to Tarshish. 4 He is bewrayed by a tempest, 11 thrown into the sea, 17 and swallowed by a fish.

CHAP. I. ver. 1. Now the word of the Lord, lit. And, &c. This is the way in which the several inspired writers of the Old Testament mark that what it was given them to write, was united on to those sacred books which God had given to others to write, and formed with them one continuous whole. The word, And, implies this. It would do so in any language, and it does so in Hebrew as much as in any other. As neither we, nor any other people, would, without any meaning, use the word, And, so neither did the Hebrews. It joins the four first books of Moses together; it carries on the history through Joshua, Judges, the books of Samuel and of the Kings. After the captivity, Ezra and Nehemiah begin again where the histories before left off; the break of the captivity is bridged over; and Ezra, going back in mind to the history of God's people before the captivity, resumes the history, as if it had been of yesterday. And in the first year of Cyrus. It joins in the story of the book of Ruth before the captivity, and that of Esther afterwards. At times, even prophets employ it, in using the narrative form of themselves, as Ezekiel, And it was in the thirtieth year, in the fourth month, in the fifth day of the month, and I was in the captivity by the river of Chebar, the heavens opened and I saw. If a prophet or historian wishes to detach his prophecy or his history, he does so; as Ezra probably began the book of Chronicles anew from Adam, or as Daniel makes his prophecy a whole by itself. But then it is the more obvious that a Hebrew prophet or historian, when he does begin with the word, And, has an object in so beginning; he uses an universal word of all languages in its uniform meaning in all language, to join things together.

And yet more precisely; this form, And the word of the Lord came to saying, occurs over and over again, stringing together the pearls of great price of God's revelations, and uniting this new revelation to all those which had preceded it. The word, And, then joins on histories with histories, revelations with revelations, uniting in one the histories of God's works and words, and blending the books of Holy Scripture into one Divine book.

But the form of words must have suggested to the Jews another thought, which is part of our thankfulness and of our being, then to the Gentiles also hath God given repentance unto life. The words are the self-same familiar words with which some fresh revelation of God's Will to His people had so often been announced. Now they are prefixed to God's message to the heathen, and so as to join on that message to all the other messages to Israel. Would then God deal thenceforth with the heathen as with the Jews? Would they have their prophets? Would they be included in the one family of God? The mission of Jonah in itself was an earnest that they would; for God, Who does nothing fitfully or capriciously, in that He had begun, gave an earnest that He would carry on what He had begun. And so thereafter, the great prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, were prophets to the nations also; Daniel was a prophet among them, to them as well as to their captives. But the mission of Jonah might, so far, have been something exceptional. The enrolling his book, as an integral part of the Scriptures, joining on that prophecy to the other prophecies to Israel, was an earnest that they were to be parts of one system. But then it would be significant also, that the records of God's prophecies to the Jews, all embodied the accounts of their impenitence. Here is inserted among them an account of God's revelation to the heathen, and their repentance. "So many prophets had been sent, so many miracles wrought, so often had captivity been foreannounced to them for the multitude of their sins, and they never repented. Not for the reign of one king did they cease from the worship of the calves; not one of the kings of the ten tribes departed from the sins of Jeroboam. Elijah, sent in the Word and Spirit of the Lord, had done many miracles, yet obtained no abandonment of the calves. His miracles effected this only, that the people knew that Baal was no god, and cried out, the Lord He is the God. Elisha his disciple followed him, who asked for a double portion of the Spirit of Elijah, that he might work more miracles, to bring back the people.—He died, and, after his death as before it, the worship of the calves continued in Israel. The Lord marvelled, and was weary of Israel, knowing that if He sent to the heathen they would hear, as He saith to Ezekiel. To make trial of this, Jonah was chosen, of whom it is recorded in the book of Kings that he prophesied the restoration of the border of Israel. When then he begins by saying, And the word of the Lord came to Jonah, prefixing the word And, he refers us back to those former things, in this meaning. The children have not hearkened to what the Lord commanded, sending to them by His servants the prophets, but have hardened their necks and given themselves up to do evil before the Lord and provoke Him to anger; and therefore the word of the Lord came to Jonah, saying, Arise and go to Nineveh that great city, and preach unto her, that so Israel may be shewn, in comparison with the heathen, to be the more guilty, when the Ninevites should repent, the children of Israel persevered in unrepentance."

Jonah the son of Amittai. Both names occur here only in the Old Testament, Jonah signifies "Dove," Amittai, "the truth of God." Some of the names of the Hebrew Prophets so suit in with their times, that they must either have been given them prophetically, or assumed by themselves, as a sort of watchword, analogous to the prophetic names, given to the sons of Hosea and Isaiah. Such were the names of Elijah and Elisha, "The Lord is my God," "my God is salvation." Such too seems to be that of Jonah. The "dove" is everywhere the symbol of "mourning love." The side of his character which Jonah records is that of his defect, his want of trust in God, and so his unloving zeal against those, who were to be the instruments of God against his people. His name perhaps preserves that character by which he willed to be known among his people, one who moaned or mourned over them.

2. Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city. The Assyrian history, as far as it has yet been discovered, is very bare of events in regard to this period. We have as yet the names of three kings only for 150 years. But Assyria, as far as we know its history, was in its meridian. Just before the time of Jonah, perhaps ending in it, were the victorious reigns of Shalmanubar and Shamasiva; after him was that of Ivalush or Pul, the first aggressor upon Israel. It is clear that this was a time of Assyrian greatness: since God calls it that great city, not in relation to its extent only, but its power. A large weak city would not have been called a great city unto God<sup>1</sup>.

And cry against it. The substance of that cry is recorded afterwards, but God told to Jonah now, what message he was to cry aloud to it. For Jonah relates afterwards, how he expostulated now with God, and that his expostulation was founded on this, that God was so merciful that He would not fulfil the judgment which He threatened. Faith was strong in Jonah, while, like Apostles "the sons of thunder," before the Day of Pentecost, he knew not "what spirit he was of." Zeal for the people and, as he doubtless thought, for the glory of God, narrowed love in him. He did not, like Moses, pray<sup>2</sup>, or else blot me also out of Thy book, or like St. Paul, desire even to be an anathema from Christ<sup>3</sup> for his people's sake, so that there might be more to love his Lord. His zeal was directed, like that of the rebuked Apostles, against others, and so it too was rebuked. But his faith was strong. He shrank back from the office, as believing, not as doubting, the might of God. He thought nothing of preaching, amid that multitude of wild warriors, the stern message of God. He was willing, alone, to confront the violence of a city of 600,000, whose characteristic was violence. He was ready, at God's bidding, to enter what Nahum speaks of as a den of lions; "The dwelling of the lions and the feeding-place of the young lions, where the lion did tear in pieces enough for his whelps, and strangled for his lionesses." He feared not the fierceness of their lion-nature, but God's tenderness, and lest that tenderness should be the destruction of his own people.

Their wickedness is come up before Me. So God said to Cain, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto Me from the ground:" and of Sodom<sup>4</sup>, "The cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, because their sin is very grievous; the cry of it is come up unto Me." The wickedness is not the mere mass of human sin, of which it is said<sup>5</sup>, "the whole world lieth in wickedness," but evil-doing<sup>6</sup> towards others. This was the cause of the final sentence on Nineveh, with which Nahum closes his prophecy, "upon whom hath not thy wickedness passed continually?" It had been assigned as the ground of the judgment on Israel through Nineveh. "So shall Bethel do unto you, on account of the wickedness of your wickedness." It was the ground of the destruction by the flood. "God saw that the wickedness of man was great upon the earth." God represents Himself, the Great Judge, as sitting on His Throne in heaven, Unseen but All-seeing, to Whom the wickedness and oppressiveness of man against man goes up, appealing for His sentence against the oppressor. The cause seems oftentimes long in pleading. God is long-suffering with the oppressor too, that if so be, he may repent. So would a greater good come to the oppressed also, if the wolf became a lamb. But meanwhile, "every iniquity has its own voice at the hidden judgment seat of God." Mercy itself calls for vengeance on the unmerciful.

3. But [And] Jonah rose up to flee—from the presence of the Lord; lit. from being before the Lord<sup>12</sup>. Jonah knew well, that man could not escape from the Presence of God, Whom he knew as the Self-existing, He Who alone IS, the Maker of heaven, earth and sea. He did not flee then from His presence, knowing well what David said, "whither shall I go from Thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from Thy presence? If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall Thy hand lead me and Thy right hand shall hold me." Jonah fled, not from God's Presence, but from standing before him, as His servant and minister. He refused God's service, because, as he himself tells God afterwards<sup>14</sup>, he knew what it would end in, and he disliked it. So he acted, as men often do, who dislike God's commands. He set about removing himself as far as possible from being under the influence of God, and from the place where he could fulfil them. God bid him go to Nineveh, which lay North-East from his home; and he instantly set himself to flee to the then furthest West. Holy Scripture sets the rebellion before us in its full nakedness. The word of the Lord came unto Jonah, go to Nineveh, and Jonah rose up; he did something instantly, as the consequence of God's command. He rose up, not as other prophets, to obey, but to disobey; and that, not slowly nor irresolutely, but to flee, from standing before the Lord. He renounced his office. So when our Lord came in the Flesh, those who found what He said to be hard sayings, went away from Him, and walked no more with Him<sup>15</sup>. So the rich young man went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions. They were perhaps afraid of trusting themselves in His Presence; or they were ashamed of staying there, and not doing what He said. So men, when God secretly calls them to prayer, go and immerse themselves in business; when, in solitude, He says to their souls something which they like not, they escape His Voice in a throng. If He calls them to make sacrifices for His poor, they order themselves a new dress or some fresh sumptuousness or self-indulgence; if to celibacy, they engage themselves to marry forthwith; or, contrariwise, if He calls them not to do a thing, they do it at once, to make an end of their struggle and their obedience; to put obedience out of their power; to enter themselves on a course of disobedience. Jonah, then, in this part of his history, is the image of those who, when God calls them, disobey His call, and how He deals with them, when He does not abandon them. He lets them have their way for a time, encompasses them with difficulties, so that they shall "flee back from God displeased to God appeased."

"The whole wisdom, the whole bliss, the whole of man lies in this, to learn what God wills him to do, in what state of life, calling, duties, profession, employment, He wills him to serve Him." God sent each one of us into the world, to fulfil his own definite duties, and, through His grace, to attain to our own perfection in and through fulfilling them. He did not create us at random, to pass through the world, doing whatever self-will or our own pleasure leads us to, but to fulfil His Will. This Will of His, if we obey His earlier calls, and seek Him by prayer, in obedience, self-subduing, humility, thoughtfulness, He makes known to each by His own secret drawings, and, in absence of these, at times by His Providence or human means. And then, "to follow Him is a token of predestination." It is to place ourselves in that order of things, that pathway to our eternal mansion, for which God created us, and which God created for us. So Jesus says <sup>1</sup>, My sheep hear My voice and I know them, and they follow Me, and I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of My Hand. In these ways, God has foreordained for us all the graces which we need; in these, we shall be free from all temptations which might be too hard for us, in which our own special weakness would be most exposed. Those ways, which men choose out of mere natural taste or fancy, are mostly those which expose them to the greatest peril of sin and damnation. For they choose them, just because such pursuits flatter most their own inclinations, and give scope to their natural strength and their moral weakness. So Jonah, misliking a duty, which God gave him to fulfil, separated himself from His service, forfeited his past calling, lost, as far as in him lay, his place among "the goodly fellowship of the prophets," and, but for God's overtaking grace, would have ended his days among the disobedient. As in Holy Scripture, David stands alone of saints, who had been after their calling, bloodstained; as the penitent Robber stands alone converted in death; as S. Peter stands singly, recalled after denying his Lord; so Jonah stands, the one Prophet, who, having obeyed and then rebelled, was constrained by the overpowering Providence and love of God, to return and serve Him.

"<sup>2</sup>Being a Prophet, Jonah could not be ignorant of the mind of God, that, according to His great Wisdom and His unsearchable judgments and His untraceable and incomprehensible ways, He, through the threat, was providing for the Ninevites that they should not suffer the things threatened. To think that Jonah hoped to hide himself in the sea and elude by flight the great Eye of God, were altogether absurd and ignorant, which should not be believed, I say not of a prophet, but of no other sensible person who had any moderate knowledge of God and His supreme power. Jonah knew all this better than any one, that, planning his flight, he changed his place, but did not flee God. For this could no man do, either by hiding himself in the bosom of the earth or depths of the sea or ascending (if possible) with wings into the air, or entering the lowest hell, or encircled with thick clouds, or taking any other counsel to secure his flight. This, above all things and alone, can neither be escaped nor resisted, God. When He willeth to hold and grasp in His Hand, He overtaketh the swift, baffeth the intelligent, overthroweth the strong, boweth the lofty, tameth rashness, subdueth might. He who threatened to others the mighty Hand of God, was not himself ignorant of nor thought to flee, God. Let us not believe this. But since he saw the fall of Israel and perceived that the prophetic grace would pass over to the Gentiles, he withdrew himself from the office of preaching, and put off the command." "<sup>3</sup>The Prophet knoweth, the Holy Spirit teaching him, that the repentance of the Gentiles is the ruin of the Jews. A lover then of his country, he does not so much envy the deliverance of Nineveh, as will that his own country should not perish.—Seeing too that his fellow-prophets are sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, to excite the people to repentance, and that Balaam the soothsayer too prophesied of the salvation of Israel, he grieveth that he alone is chosen to be sent to the Assyrians, the enemies of Israel, and to that greatest city of the enemies where was idolatry and ignorance of God. Yet more he feared lest they, on occasion of his preaching, being converted to repentance, Israel should be wholly forsaken. For he knew by the same Spirit whereby the preaching to the Gentiles was entrusted to him, that the house of Israel would then perish; and he feared that what was at one time to be, should take place in his own time." "The flight of the Prophet may also be referred to that of man in general who, despising the commands of God, departed from Him and gave himself to the world, where subsequently, through the storms of ill and the wreck of the whole world raging against him, he was compelled to feel the Presence of God, and to return to Him Whom he had fled. Whence we understand, that those things also which men think for their good, when against the Will of God, are turned to destruction; and help not only does not benefit those to whom it is given, but those too who give it, are alike crushed. As we read that Egypt was conquered by the Assyrians, because it helped Israel against the Will of God. The ship is imperilled which had received the emperor; a tempest arises in a calm; nothing is secure, when God is against us."

Tarshish, named after one of the sons of Javan<sup>5</sup>, was an ancient merchant-city of Spain, once proverbial for its wealth<sup>6</sup>, which supplied Judæa with silver<sup>7</sup>, Tyre with all manner of riches, with iron also, tin, lead<sup>8</sup>. It was known to the Greeks and Romans, as (with a harder pronunciation) Tartessus; but in our first century, it had either ceased to be, or was known under some other name<sup>9</sup>. Ships destined for a voyage, at that time, so long, and built for carrying merchandise, were naturally among the largest then constructed. Ships of Tarshish corresponded to the "East-Indiamen" which some of us remember. The breaking of ships of Tarshish by the East wind<sup>10</sup> is, on account of their size and general safety, instanced as a special token of the interposition of God.

And went down to Joppa. Joppa, now Jaffa, was the one well-known port of Israel on the Mediterranean. Thither the cedars were brought from Lebanon for both the first and second temple<sup>11</sup>. Simon the Maccabee "<sup>12</sup> took it again for a haven, and made an entrance to the isles of the sea." It was subsequently destroyed by the Romans, as a pirate-haven<sup>13</sup>. At a later time, all describe it as an unsafe haven. Perhaps the shore changed, since the rings, to which Andromeda was fabled to have been fastened, and which probably were once used to moor vessels, were high above the sea. Perhaps, like the Channel Islands, the navigation was safe to those who knew the coast, unsafe to others. To this port Jonah went down from his native country, the mountain district of Zabulon. Perhaps it was not at this time in the hands of Israel. At least, the sailors were heathen. He went down, as the man who fell among the thieves, is said to have gone down from Jerusalem to Jericho<sup>14</sup>. He went down from the place which God honoured by His Presence and protection.

And he paid the fare thereof. Jonah describes circumstantially, how he took every step to his end. He went down, found a strong-built ship going whither he wished, paid his fare, embarked. He seemed now to have done all. He had severed himself from the country where his office lay. He had no further step to take. Winds and waves would do the rest. He had but to be still. He went, only to be brought back again.

<sup>1</sup> Sin brings our soul into much senselessness. For as those overtaken by heaviness of head and drunkenness, are borne on simply and at random, and, be there pit or precipice or whatever else below them, they fall into it unawares; so too, they who fall into sin, intoxicated by their desire of the object, know not what they do, see nothing before them, present or future. Tell me, Fleest thou the Lord? Wait then a little, and thou shalt learn from the event, that thou canst not escape the hands of His servant, the sea. For as soon as he embarked, it too roused its waves and raised them up on high; and as a faithful servant, finding her fellow-slave stealing some of his master's property, ceases not from giving endless trouble to those who take him in, until she recover him, so too the sea, finding and recognising her fellow-servant, harasses the sailors unceasingly, raging, roaring, not dragging them to a tribunal but threatening to sink the vessel with all its men, unless they restore to her, her fellow-servant."

<sup>2</sup> The sinner arises, because, will he, nill he, toil he must. If he shrinks from the way of God, because it is hard, he may not yet be idle. There is the way of ambition, of covetousness, of pleasure, to be trodden, which certainly are far harder. 'We wearied ourselves<sup>3</sup>, say the wicked, 'in the way of wickedness and destruction, yea, we have gone through deserts where there lay no way; but the way of the Lord we have not known.' Jonah would not arise, to go to Nineveh at God's command; yet he must needs arise, to flee to Tarshish from before the Presence of God. What good can he have who fleeth the Good? what light, who willingly forsaketh the Light? He goes down to Joppa. Wherever thou turnest, if thou depart from the Will of God, thou goest down.—Whatever glory, riches, power, honours, thou gainest, thou risest not a whit; the more thou advancest, while turned from God, the deeper and deeper thou goest down.—Yet all these things are not had, without paying the price. At a price and with toil, he obtains what he desires; he receives nothing gratis, but, at great price purchases to himself storms, griefs, peril. There arises a great tempest in the sea, when various contradictory passions arise in the heart of the sinner, which take from him all tranquillity and joy. There is a tempest in the sea, when God sends strong and dangerous disease, whereby the frame is in peril of being broken. There is a tempest in the sea, when, thro' rivals or competitors for the same pleasures, or the injured, or the civil magistrate, his guilt is discovered, he is laden with infamy and odium, punished, withheld from his wonted pleasures. <sup>4</sup> They who go down to the sea of this world, and do business in mighty waters—their soul melteth away because of trouble; they reel to and fro and stagger like a drunken man, and all their wisdom is swallowed up."

5. But [And] the Lord sent out [lit. cast along]. Jonah had done his all. Now God's part began. This he expresses by the word, And. Jonah took his measures, and now God takes His. He had let him have his way, as He often deals with those who rebel against Him. He lets them have their way up to a certain point. He waits, in the tranquillity of His Almightyness, until they have completed their preparations; and then, when man has ended, He begins, that man may see the more that it is His doing. <sup>5</sup> He takes those who flee from Him in their flight, the wise in their counsels, sinners in their conceits and sins, and draws them back to Himself and compels them to return. Jonah thought to find rest in the sea, and lo! a tempest." Probably, God summoned back Jonah, as soon as he had completed all on his part, and sent the tempest, soon after he left the shore. At least, such tempests often swept along that shore, and were known by their own special name, like the Euroclydon off Crete. Jonah too alone had gone down below deck to sleep, and, when the storm came, the mariners thought it possible to put back. Josephus says of that shore, <sup>6</sup> "Joppa having by nature no haven, for it ends in a rough shore, mostly abrupt, but for a short space having projections, i. e. deep rocks and cliffs advancing into the sea, inclining on either side towards each other (where the traces of the chains of Andromeda yet shewn accredit the antiquity of the fable,) and the North wind beating right on the shore, and dashing the high waves against the rocks which receive them, makes the station there a harbourless sea. As those from Joppa were tossing here, a strong wind (called by those who sail here, the black North wind) falls upon them at daybreak, dashing straightway some of the ships against each other, some against the rocks, and some, forcing their way against the waves to the open sea, (for they fear the rocky shore—) the breakers towering above them, sank."

The ship was like [lit. thought] to be broken. Perhaps Jonah means by this very vivid image to exhibit the more his own dulness. He ascribes, as it were, to the ship a sense of its own danger, as she heaved and rolled and creaked and quivered under the weight of the storm which lay on her, and her masts groaned, and her yard-arms shivered. To the awakened conscience every thing seems to have been alive to God's displeasure, except itself.

5. And cried, every man unto his God. They did what they could. <sup>7</sup> Not knowing the truth, they yet know of a Providence, and, amid religious error, know that there is an Object of reverence." In ignorance they had received one who offended God. And now God, Whom they ignorantly worshipped<sup>8</sup>, while they cried to the gods, who, they thought, disposed of them, heard them. They escaped with the loss of their wares, but God saved their lives and revealed Himself to them. God hears ignorant prayer, when ignorance is not wilful and sin.

To lighten it of them, lit. to lighten from against them, to lighten what was so much against them, what so oppressed them. <sup>7</sup> They thought that the ship was weighed down by its

the sea, to lighten it of them. But Jonah was gone down<sup>1</sup> into the sides of the ship; and he lay, and was fast asleep.

6 So the shipmaster came to him, and said unto him, What meanest thou, O sleeper? arise, <sup>2</sup> call upon thy God, <sup>3</sup> if so be that wanted lading, and they knew not that the whole weight was that of the fugitive Prophet." <sup>4</sup> "The sailors cast forth their wares, but the ship was not lightened. For the whole weight still remained, the body of the Prophet, that heavy burden, not from the nature of the body, but from the burden of sin. For nothing is so onerous and heavy as sin and disobedience. Whence also Zechariah<sup>2</sup> represented it under the image of lead. And David, describing its nature, said<sup>3</sup>, my wickednesses are gone over my head; as a heavy burden they are too heavy for me. And Christ cried aloud to those who lived in many sins<sup>4</sup>, Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will refresh you."

Jonah was gone down, probably before the beginning of the storm, not simply before the lightening of the vessel. He could hardly have fallen asleep then. A heathen ship was a strange place for a prophet of God, not as a prophet, but as a fugitive; and so, probably, ashamed of what he had completed, he had withdrawn from sight and notice. He did not embolden himself in his sin, but shrank into himself. The conscience most commonly awakes, when the sin is done. It stands aghast at itself; but Satan, if he can, cuts off its retreat. Jonah had no retreat now, unless God had made one.

And was fast asleep. The journey to Joppa had been long and hurried; he had fled. Sorrow and remorse completed what fatigue began. Perhaps he had given himself up to sleep, to dull his conscience. For it is said, he lay down and was fast asleep. Grief produces sleep; whence it is said of the Apostles in the night before the Lord's Passion, when Jesus rose up from prayer and was come to His disciples, He found them sleeping for sorrow<sup>5</sup>. "Jonah slept heavily. Deep was the sleep, but it was not of pleasure but of grief; not of heartlessness, but of heavy-heartedness. For well-disposed servants soon feel their sins, as did he. For when the sin has been done, then he knows its frightfulness. For such is sin. When born, it awakens pangs in the soul which bare it, contrary to the law of our nature. For so soon as we are born, we end the travail-pangs; but sin, so soon as born, rends with pangs the thoughts which conceived it." Jonah was in a deep sleep, a sleep by which he was fast held and bound<sup>6</sup>; a sleep as deep as that from which Sisera never woke<sup>7</sup>. Had God allowed the ship to sink, the memory of Jonah would have been that of the fugitive prophet. As it is, his deep sleep stands as an image of the lethargy of sin. "This most deep sleep of Jonah signifies a man torpid and slumbering in error, to whom it sufficed not to flee from the face of God, but his mind, drowned in a stupor and not knowing the displeasure of God, lies asleep, steeped in security."

6. What meanest thou? or rather, what aileth thee? [lit. what is to thee?] The shipmaster speaks of it (as it was) as a sort of disease, that he should be thus asleep in the common peril. The shipmaster, charged, as he by office was, with the common weal of those on board, would, in the common peril, have one common prayer. It was the Prophet's office to call the heathen to prayers and to calling upon God. God reproved the Scribes and Pharisees by the mouth of the children who cried Hosanna<sup>9</sup>; Jonah by the shipmaster; David by Abigail<sup>10</sup>; Naaman by his servants. Now too he reproves worldly priests by the devotion of laymen, sceptic intellect by the simplicity of faith.

If so be that God will think upon us, [lit. for us] i. e. for good; as David says<sup>11</sup>, I am poor and needy, the Lord thinketh upon [lit. for] me. Their calling upon their own gods had failed them. Perhaps the shipmaster had seen something special about Jonah, his manner, or his prophet's garb. He does not only call Jonah's God, thy God, as Darius says to Daniel thy God<sup>12</sup>, but also the God, acknowledging the God Whom Jonah worshipped, to be the God. It is not any heathen prayer which he asks Jonah to offer. It is the prayer of the creature in its need to God Who can help; but knowing its own ill-desert, and the separation between itself and God, it knows not whether He will help it. So David says<sup>13</sup>, Remember not the sins of my youth nor my transgressions; according to Thy mercy remember Thou me for Thy goodness' sake, O Lord.

"The shipmaster knew from experience, that it was no common storm, that the surges were an infliction borne down from God, and above human skill, and that there was no good in the master's skill. For the state of things needed another Master Who ordereth the heavens, and craved the guidance from on high. So then they too left oars, sails, cables, gave their hands rest from rowing, and stretched them to heaven and called on God."

7. Come, and let us cast lots. Jonah too had probably prayed, and his prayers too were not heard. Probably, too, the storm had some unusual character about it, the suddenness with which it burst upon them, its violence, the quarter whence it came, its whirlwind force. "They knew the nature of the sea, and, as experienced sailors, were acquainted with the character of wind and storm, and had these waves been such as they had known before, they would never have sought by lot for the author of the threatened wreck, or, by a thing uncertain, sought to escape certain peril." God, Who sent the storm to arrest Jonah and to cause him to be cast into the sea, provided that its character should set the mariners on divining, why it came. Even when working great miracles, God brings about, through man, all the forerunning events, all but the last act, in which He puts forth His might. As, in His people, he directed the lot to fall on Achan or on Jonathan, so here He overruled the lots of the heathen sailors to accomplish His end. "We must not, on this precedent, forthwith trust in lots, or unite with this testimony that from the Acts of the Apostles, when Matthias was by lot elected to the Apostolate, since the privileges of individuals cannot form a common law." "Lots," according to the ends for which they were cast, were<sup>14</sup> for i) dividing; ii) consulting; iii) divining.

i.) The lot for dividing is not wrong if not used, 1) "without any necessity; for this would be to tempt God:" 2) "if in case of necessity, not without reverence of God, as if Holy Scripture were used for an earthly end," as in determining any secular matter by opening the Bible<sup>2</sup>: 3) for objects which ought to be decided otherwise, (as, an office ought to be given to the fittest:) 4) in dependence upon any other than God. <sup>3</sup> The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing of it is the Lord's. So then they are lawful "in secular things which cannot otherwise be conveniently distributed," or "when there is no apparent reason why, in any advantage or disadvantage, one should be preferred to another." S. Augustine even allows<sup>6</sup> that, in a time of plague or persecution, the lot might be cast to decide who should remain to administer the Sacraments to the people, lest, on the one side, all should be taken away, or, on the other, the Church be deserted. ii. The lot for consulting, i. e. to decide what one should do, is wrong, unless in a matter of mere indifference, or under inspiration of God, or in some extreme necessity where all human means fail. iii. The lot for divining, i. e. to learn truth, whether of things present or future, of which we can have no human knowledge, is wrong, except by direct inspiration of God. For it is either to tempt God Who has not promised so to reveal things, or, against God, to seek superhuman knowledge by ways unsanctioned by Him. Satan may readily mix himself unknown in such enquiries, as in mesmerism. Forbidden ground is his own province.

God overruled the lot in the case of Jonah, as He did the sign which the Philistines sought. "He made the heifers take the way to Bethshemesh, that the Philistines might know that the plague came to them, not by chance, but from Himself." "The fugitive (Jonah) was taken by lot, not by any virtue of the lots, especially the lots of heathen, but by the Will of Him Who guided the uncertain lots." "The lot betrayed the culprit. Yet not even thus did they cast him over; but, even while such a tumult and storm lay on them, they held, as it were, a court in the vessel, as though in entire peace, and allowed him a hearing and defence, and sifted every thing accurately, as men who were to give account of their judgment. Hear them sifting all as in a court.—The roaring sea accused him; the lot convicted and witnessed against him, yet not even thus did they pronounce against him—until the accused should be the accuser of his own sin. The sailors, uneducated, untaught, imitated the good order of courts. When the sea scarce allowed them to breathe, whence such forethought about the Prophet? By the disposal of God. For God by all this instructed the Prophet to be humane and mild, all but saying aloud to him; 'Imitate these uninstructed sailors. They think not lightly of one soul, nor are unsparing as to one body, thine own. But thou, for thy part, gavest up a whole city with so many myriads. They, discovering thee to be the cause of the evils which befel them, did not even thus hurry to condemn thee. Thou, having nothing whercof to accuse the Ninevites, didst sink and destroy them. Thou, when I bade thee go and by thy preaching call them to repentance, obeyedst not; these, untaught, do all, compass all, in order to recover thee, already condemned, from punishment."

8. Tell us, for whose cause [lit. for what to whom.] It may be that they thought that Jonah had been guilty toward some other. The lot had pointed him out. The mariners, still fearing to do wrong, ask him thronged questions, to know why the anger of God followed him; what hast thou done to whom? what thine occupation? i. e. either his ordinary occupation, whether it was displeasing to God? or this particular business in which he was engaged, and for which he was come on board. Questions so thronged have been admired in human poetry, S. Jerome says. For it is true to nature. They think that some one of them will draw forth the answer which they wish. It may be that they thought that his country, or people, or parents, were under the displeasure of God. But perhaps, more naturally, they wished to "know all about him," as men say. These questions must have gone home to Jonah's conscience. What is thy business? The office of Prophet which he had left. Whence comest thou? From standing before God, as His minister. What thy country? of what people art thou? The people of God, whom he had quitted for heaven; not to win them to God, as He commanded; but, not knowing what they did, to abet him in his flight.

What is thine occupation? They should ask themselves, who have Jonah's office to speak in the name of God, and preach repentance. "What should be thy business, who hast consecrated thyself wholly to God, whom God has loaded with daily benefits? who approachest to Him as to a Friend? What is thy business? To live for God, to despise the things of earth, to behold the things of Heaven," to lead others heavenward.

Jonah answers simply the central point to which all these questions tended;

9. I am an Hebrew. This was the name by which Israel was known to foreigners. It is used in the Old Testament, only when they are spoken of by foreigners, or speak of themselves to foreigners, or when the sacred writers mention them in contrast with foreigners<sup>11</sup>. So Joseph spoke of his land<sup>12</sup>, and the Hebrew midwives<sup>13</sup>, and Moses' sister<sup>14</sup>, and God in His commission to Moses<sup>15</sup> as to Pharaoh, and Moses in fulfilling it<sup>16</sup>. They had the name, as having passed the river Euphrates, "emigrants." The title might serve to remind themselves, that they were strangers and pilgrims<sup>17</sup>, whose fathers had left their home at God's command and for God, "passers by, through this world to death, and through death to immortality."

And I fear the Lord, i. e. I am a worshipper of Him, most commonly, one who habitually stands in awe of Him, and so one who stands in awe of sin too. For none really fear God, none fear Him as sons, who do not fear Him in act. To be afraid, and said unto him, Why hast thou done this? For the men knew that he fled from the presence of the LORD, because he had told them.

11 ¶ Then said they unto him, What afraid of God is not to fear Him. To be afraid of God keeps men away from God; to fear God draws them to Him. Here, however, Jonah probably meant to tell them, that the Object of his fear and worship was the One Self-existing God, He Who alone IS, Who made all things, in Whose hands are all things. He had told them before, that he had fled from being before the LORD. They had not thought anything of this, for they thought of the LORD, only as the God of the Jews. Now he adds, that He, Whose service he had thus forsaken, was the God of heaven, Who made the sea and dry land, that sea, whose raging terrified them and threatened their lives. The title, the God of heaven, asserts the doctrine of the creation of the heavens by God, and His supremacy. Hence Abraham uses it to his servant<sup>1</sup>, and Jonah to the heathen mariners, and Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar<sup>2</sup>; and Cyrus in acknowledging God in his proclamation<sup>3</sup>. After his example, it is used in the decrees of Darius<sup>4</sup> and Artaxerxes<sup>5</sup>, and the returned exiles use it in giving account of their building the temple to the Governor<sup>6</sup>. Perhaps, from the habit of intercourse with the heathen, it is used once by Daniel<sup>7</sup> and by Nehemiah<sup>8</sup>. Melchisedek, not perhaps being acquainted with the special name, the LORD, blessed Abraham in the Name of God, the Possessor or Creator of heaven and earth<sup>9</sup>, i. e. of all that is. Jonah, by using it, at once taught the sailors that there is One Lord of all, and why this evil had fallen on them, because they had with them himself, the renegade servant of God. “<sup>10</sup> When Jonah said this, he indeed feared God and repented of his sin. If he lost filial fear by fleeing and disobeying, he recovered it by repentance.”

10. Then were the men exceedingly afraid. Before, they had feared the tempest and the loss of their lives. Now they feared God. They feared, not the creature but the Creator. They knew that what they had feared was the doing of His Almightiness. They felt how awful a thing it was to be in His Hands. Such fear is the beginning of conversion, when men turn from dwelling on the distresses which surround them, to God Who sent them.

Why hast thou done this? They are words of amazement and wonder. Why hast thou not obeyed so great a God, and how thoughtest thou to escape the hand of the Creator? “<sup>10</sup> What is the mystery of thy flight? Why did one, who feared God and had revelations from God, flee, sooner than go to fulfil them? Why did the worshipper of the One true God depart from his God?” “<sup>11</sup> A servant flee from his Lord, a son from his father, man from his God!” The inconsistency of believers is the marvel of the young Christian, the repulsion of those without, the hardening of the unbeliever. If men really believed in eternity, how could they be thus immersed in things of time? If they believed in hell, how could they so hurry thither? If they believed that God died for them, how could they so requite Him? Faith without love, knowledge without obedience, conscious dependence and rebellion, to be favoured by God yet to despise His favour, are the strangest marvels of this mysterious world. All nature seems to cry out to and against the unfaithful Christian, why hast thou done this? And what a why it is! A scoffer has lately said truly, “<sup>12</sup> Avowed scepticism cannot do a tenth part of the injury to practical faith, that the constant spectacle of the huge mass of worldly unreal belief does.” It is nothing strange, that the world or unsanctified intellect should reject the Gospel. It is a thing of course, unless it be converted. But, to know, to believe, and to obey! To disobey God, in the name of God. To propose to halve the living Gospel, as the woman who had killed her child<sup>13</sup>, and to think that the poor quivering remnants would be the living Gospel any more! As though the Will of God might, like those lower forms of His animal creation, be divided endlessly, and keep what fragments we will, it would still be a living whole, a vessel of His Spirit! Such unrealities and inconsistencies would be a sore trial of faith, had not Jesus, Who <sup>14</sup> knew what is in man, forewarned us that it should be so. The scandals against the Gospel, so contrary to all human opinion, are but a testimony the more to the Divine knowledge of the Redeemer.

11. What shall we do unto thee? They knew him to be a prophet; they ask him the mind of his God. The lots had marked out Jonah as the cause of the storm; Jonah had himself admitted it, and that the storm was for his cause, and came from his God. “<sup>11</sup> Great was he who fled, greater He Who required him. They dare not give him up; they cannot conceal him. They blame the fault; they confess their fear; they ask him the remedy, who was the author of the sin. If it was faulty to receive thee, what can we do, that God should not be angered? It is thine to direct; ours, to obey.”

The sea wrought and was tempestuous, lit. was going and whirling. It was not only increasingly tempestuous, but, like a thing alive and obeying its Master's Will, it was holding on its course, its wild waves tossing themselves, and marching on like battalions, marshalled, arrayed for the end for which they were sent, pursuing and demanding the runaway slave of God. “<sup>11</sup> It was going, as it was bidden; it was going to avenge its Lord; it was going, pursuing the fugitive Prophet. It was swelling every moment, and, as though the sailors were too tardy, was rising in yet greater surges, shewing that the vengeance of the Creator admitted not of delay.”

12. Take me up, and cast me into the sea. Neither might Jonah have said this, nor might the sailors have obeyed it, without the command of God. Jonah might will alone to perish, who had alone offended; but, without the command of God, the Giver of life, neither Jonah nor the sailors might dispose of the life of Jonah. But God willed that Jonah should be cast into the sea, whither he had gone for refuge, that <sup>15</sup> wherewithal he had sinned, by the same also he might be punished as a man; and, as a Prophet, that he might, in his three days burial, prefigure Him Who, after His Resurrection, should convert, not Nineveh, but the world, the cry of whose wickedness went up to God.

sea be calm unto you: for I know that for my sake this great tempest is upon you.

† Heb. digged.

13 Nevertheless the men † rowed hard to bring it to the land; † but they could not: for the sea wrought, and was tempestuous against them.

14 Wherefore they cried unto the Lord,

For I know that for my sake. “<sup>1</sup> In that he says, I know, he marks that he had a revelation; in that he says, this great storm, he marks the need which lay on those who cast him into the sea.”

13. The men rowed hard, lit. dug. The word, like our “ploughed the main,” describes the great efforts which they made. Amid the violence of the storm, they had furled their sails. These were worse than useless. The wind was off shore, since by rowing alone they hoped to get back to it. They put their oars well and firmly in the sea, and turned up the water, as men turn up earth by digging. But in vain! God willed it not. The sea went on its way, as before. In the description of the deluge, it is repeated, the waters increased and bare up the ark, and it was lifted up above the earth; the waters increased greatly upon the earth; and the ark went upon the face of the waters. The waters raged and swelled, drowned the whole world, yet only bore up the ark, as a steed bears its rider: man was still, the waters obeyed. In this tempest, on the contrary, man strove, but, instead of the peace of the ark, the burden is, the violence of the tempest; the sea wrought and was tempestuous against them. “<sup>2</sup> The Prophet had pronounced sentence against himself, but they would not lay hands upon him, striving hard to get back to land, and escape the risk of bloodshed, willing to lose life rather than cause its loss. O what a change was there. The people who had served God, said, Crucify Him, Crucify Him! These are bidden to put to death; the sea rageth; the tempest commandeth; and they are careless as to their own safety, while anxious about another’s.”

14. Wherefore [And] they cried unto the Lord. They cried no more each man to his god, but to the one God, Whom Jonah had made known to them; and to Him they cried with an earnest, submissive, cry, repeating the words of beseeching, as men do in great earnestness; we beseech Thee, O Lord, let us not, we beseech Thee, perish for the life of this man (i. e. as a penalty for taking it, as it is said, we will slay him for the life of his brother, and, life for life.) They seem to have known what is said, your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man’s brother will I require the life of man. Whoso sheddeth man’s blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God made He man. “<sup>3</sup> Do not these words of the sailors seem to us to be the confession of Pilate, who washed his hands, and said, I am clean from the blood of this Man? The Gentiles would not that Christ should perish; they protest that His Blood is innocent.”

And lay not upon us innocent blood; innocent as to them, although, as to this thing, guilty before God, and yet, as to God also, more innocent, they would think, than they. For, strange as was this one disobedience, their whole life, they now knew, was, disobedience to God; his, but one act in a life of obedience. If God so punishes one sin of the holy, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear? Terrible to the awakened conscience are God’s chastenings on some (as it seems) single offence of those whom He loves.

For Thou, Lord, [Who knowest the hearts of all men,] hast done, as it pleased Thee. Wonderful, concise, confession of faith in these new converts! Psalmists said it <sup>4</sup>, Whatsoever God willeth, that doeth He in heaven and in earth, in the sea and in all deep places. But these had but just known God, and they resolve the whole mystery of man’s agency and God’s Providence into the three simple words <sup>5</sup>, as [Thou] willedest [Thou] didst. “<sup>6</sup> That we took him aboard, that the storm ariseth, that the winds rage, that the billows lift themselves, that the fugitive is betrayed by the lot, that he points out what is to be done, it is of Thy Will, O Lord.” “<sup>7</sup> The tempest itself speaketh, that Thou, Lord, hast done as Thou willedest. Thy Will is fulfilled by our hands.” “<sup>8</sup> Observe the counsel of God, that, of his own will, not by violence or by necessity, should he be cast into the sea. For the casting of Jonah into the sea signified the entrance of Christ into the bitterness of the Passion, which He took upon Himself of His own Will, not of necessity. <sup>9</sup> He was offered up, and He willingly submitted Himself. And as those who sailed with Jonah were delivered, so the faithful in the Passion of Christ. <sup>10</sup> If ye seek Me, let these go their way, that the saying might be fulfilled which Jesus spake, Of them which Thou gavest Me, I have lost none.”

15. They took up Jonah. “<sup>11</sup> He does not say, ‘laid hold on him’, nor ‘came upon him’ but lifted him; as it were, bearing him with respect and honour, they cast him into the sea, not resisting, but yielding himself to their will.”

The sea ceased [lit. stood] from his raging. Ordinarily, the waves still swell, when the wind has ceased. The sea, when it had received Jonah, was hushed at once, to shew that God alone raised and quelled it. It stood still, like a servant, when it had accomplished its mission. God, Who at all times saith to it, <sup>12</sup> Hitherto shalt thou come and no further, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed, now unseen, as afterwards in the Flesh, <sup>13</sup> rebuked the winds and the sea, and there was a great calm. “<sup>14</sup> If we consider the errors of the world before the Passion of Christ, and the conflicting blasts of divers doctrines, and the vessel, and the whole race of man, i. e. the creature of the Lord, imperilled, and, after His Passion, the tranquillity of faith and the peace of the world and the security of all things and the conversion to God, we shall see how, after Jonah was cast in, the sea stood from its raging.” “<sup>15</sup> Jonah, in the sea, a fugitive, shipwrecked, dead, saveth the tempest-tost vessel; he saveth the heathen, aforetime tossed to and fro by the error of the world into divers opinions. And Hosea, Amos, Isaiah, Joel, who prophesied at the same time, could not amend the people in Judæa; whence it appeared that the breakers could not be calmed, save by the death of [Him typified by] the fugitive."

16. And the men feared the Lord with a great fear; because, from the tranquillity of the sea and the ceasing of the tempest, they saw that the Prophet's words were true. This great miracle completed the conversion of the mariners. God had removed all human cause of fear; and yet, in the same words as before, he says, they feared a great fear; but he adds, the Lord. It was the great fear, with which even the disciples of Jesus feared, when they saw the miracles which He did, which made even Peter say, Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord. Events full of wonder had thronged upon them; things beyond nature, and contrary to nature; things which betokened His Presence, Who had all things in His hands. They had seen wind and storm fulfilling His word<sup>2</sup>, and, forerunners of the fishermen of Galilee, knowing full well from their own experience that this was above nature, they felt a great awe of God. So He commanded His people, Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God<sup>3</sup>, for thy good always<sup>4</sup>.

And offered a sacrifice. Doubtless, as it was a large decked vessel and bound on a long voyage, they had live creatures on board, which they could offer in sacrifice. But this was not enough for their thankfulness; they vowed vows. They promised that they would do thereafter what they could not do then; "that they would never depart from Him Whom they had begun to worship." This was true love, not to be content with aught which they could do, but to stretch forward in thought to an abiding and enlarged obedience, as God should enable them. And so they were doubtless enrolled among the people of God, first-fruits from among the heathen, won to God Who overrules all things, through the disobedience and repentance of His Prophet. Perhaps, they were the first preachers among the heathen, and their account of their own wonderful deliverance prepared the way for Jonah's mission to Nineveh.

17. Now the Lord had [lit. And the Lord] prepared. Jonah (as appears from his thanksgiving) was not swallowed at once, but sank to the bottom of the sea, God preserving him in life there by miracle, as He did in the fish's belly. Then, when the sea-weed was twined around his head, and he seemed to be already buried till the sea should give up her dead, God prepared the fish to swallow Jonah. "God could as easily have kept Jonah alive in the sea as in the fish's belly, but, in order to prefigure the burial of the Lord, He willed him to be within the fish whose belly was as a grave." Jonah, does not say what fish it was; and our Lord too used a name, signifying only one of the very largest fish<sup>7</sup>. Yet it were no greater miracle to create a fish which should swallow Jonah, than to preserve him alive when swallowed. "The infant is buried, as it were, in the womb of its mother; it cannot breathe, and yet, thus too, it liveth and is preserved, wonderfully nurtured by the will of God." He Who preserves the embryo in its living grave can maintain the life of man as easily without the outward air as with it. The same Divine Will preserves in being the whole creation, or creates it. The same Will of God keeps us in life by breathing this outward air, Which preserved Jonah without it. How long will men think of God, as if He were man, of the Creator as if He were a creature, as though creation were but one intricate piece of machinery, which is to go on, ringing its regular changes until it shall be worn out, and God were shut up, as a sort of mainspring within it, Who might be allowed to be a primal Force, to set it in motion, but must not be allowed to vary what He has once made? "We must admit of the agency of God," say these men<sup>9</sup> when they would not in name be Atheists, "once in the beginning of things, but must allow of His interference as sparingly as may be." Most wise arrangement of the creature, if it were indeed the god of its God! Most considerate provision for the non-interference of its Maker, if it could but secure that He would not interfere with it for ever! Acute physical philosophy, which, by its omnipotent word, would undo the Acts of God! Heartless, senseless, sightless, world, which exists in God, is upheld by God, whose every breath is an effluence of God's love, and which yet sees Him not, thanks Him not, thinks it a greater thing to hold its own frail existence from some imagined law, than to be the object of the tender personal care of the Infinite God, Who is Love! Poor hoodwinked souls, which would extinguish for themselves the Light of the world, in order that it may not eclipse the rushlight of their own theory!

And Jonah was in the belly of the fish. The time that Jonah was in the fish's belly was a hidden prophecy. Jonah does not explain nor point it. He tells the fact, as Scripture is wont. Then he singles out one, the turning point in it. Doubtless in those three days and nights of darkness, Jonah, (like him who after his conversion became S. Paul,) meditated much, repented much, sorrowed much, for the love of God, that he had ever offended God, purposed future obedience, adored God with wondering awe for His judgment and mercy. It was a narrow home, in which Jonah, by miracle, was not consumed; by miracle, breathed; by miracle, retained his senses in that fetid place. Jonah doubtless, repented, marvelled, adored, loved God. But, of all, God has singled out this one point, how, out of such a place, Jonah thanked God. As He delivered Paul and Silas from the prison, when they prayed with a loud voice to Him, so when Jonah, by inspiration of His Spirit, thanked Him, He delivered him. To thank God, only in order to obtain fresh gifts from Him, would be but a refined, hypocritical form of selfishness. Such a formal act would not be thanks at all. We thank God, because we love Him, because He is so infinitely Good, and so good to us, unworthy. Thanklessness shuts the door to His personal mercies to us, because it makes them the occasion of fresh sins of our's. Thankfulness sets God's essential Goodness free (so to speak) to be good to us. He can do what He delights in doing, be good to us, without our making His Goodness a source of harm to us. Thanking Him through His grace, we become fit vessels for larger graces. "Blessed he who, at every gift of grace, returns to Him in Whom is all fulness of graces; to Whom when we shew ourselves not ungrateful for gifts receive-ed, we make room in ourselves for grace, and become meet for receiving yet more." But Jonah's was that special character of thankfulness, which thanks God in the midst of calamities from which there was no human exit ; and God set His seal on this sort of thankfulness, by annexing this deliverance, which has consecrated Jonah as an image of our Lord, to his wonderful act of thanksgiving.

II. 1. Then [And] Jonah prayed, i. e. when the three days and nights were passed, he uttered this devotion. The word prayed includes thanksgiving, not petition only. It is said of Hannah that she prayed<sup>1</sup> ; but her canticle is all one thanksgiving without a single petition. In this thanksgiving Jonah says how his prayers had been heard, but prays no more. God had delivered him from the sea, and he thanks God, in the fish's belly, as undisturbed as in a Church or an oratory, secure that God, Who had done so much, would fulfil the rest. He called God, his God, Who had in so many ways shewn Himself his, by His revelations, by His inspirations, by His chastisements, and now by His mercy. "<sup>2</sup> From these words, Jonah prayed unto the Lord his God out of the fish's belly, we perceive that, after he felt himself safe in the fish's belly, he despaired not of God's mercy."

2. I cried by reason of mine affliction, or, out of affliction which came to me. So the Psalmist thanked God in the same words, though in a different order<sup>3</sup> ; To the Lord in trouble to me I called, and He heard me. He called, and God heard and answered. "<sup>4</sup> He does not say, I call, but I called ; he does not pray for the future, but gives thanks for the past." Strange cause of thankfulness this would seem to most faith, to be alive in such a grave ; to abide there hour after hour, and day after day, in one unchanging darkness, carried to and fro helplessly, with no known escape from his fetid prison, except to death ! Yet spiritual light shone on that depth of darkness. The voracious creature, which never opened his mouth save to destroy life, had swallowed him, to save it. "<sup>5</sup> What looked like death, became safe-keeping," and so the Prophet who had fled to avoid doing the Will of God and to do his own, now willed to be borne about, he knew not whither, at the will, as it seemed, of the huge animal in which he lay, but in truth, whither God directed it, and he gave thanks. God had heard him. The first token of God's mercy was the earnest of the whole. God was dealing with him, was looking on him. It was enough.

Out of the belly of hell cried I. The deep waters were as a grave, and he was counted among the dead<sup>6</sup>. Death seemed so certain that it was all one as if he were in the womb of hell, not to be re-born to life until the last Day. So David said<sup>7</sup>, The bands of death compassed me round about ; and, <sup>8</sup> Thou hast drawn my life out of hell. The waters choked his speech ; but he cried with a loud cry to God Who knew the heart. I cried ; Thou heardest. The words vary only by a kindred letter<sup>9</sup>, Shivva'ti, Shama'ta. The real heart's-cry to God according to the mind of God and His hearing are one, whether, for man's good, He seem at the time to hear or no.

"<sup>8</sup> Not of the voice but of the heart is God the Hearer, as He is the Seer.—Do the ears of God wait for sound ? How then could the prayer of Jonah from the inmost belly of the whale, through the bowels of so great a creature, out of the very bottomless depths, through so great a mass of waters, make its way to Heaven ?" "<sup>9</sup> Loud crying to God is not with the voice but with the heart. Many, silent with their lips, have cried aloud with their heart ; many, noisy with their lips, could, with heart turned away, obtain nothing. If then thou criest, cry within, where God heareth." "<sup>10</sup> Jonah cried aloud to God out of the fish's belly, out of the deep of the sea, out of the depths of disobedience ; and his prayer reached to God, Who rescued him from the waves, brought him forth out of the vast creature, absolved him from the guilt. Let the sinner too cry aloud, whom, departing from God, the storm of desires overwhelmed, the malignant Enemy devoured, the waves of this present world sucked-under ! Let him own that he is in the depth, that so his prayer may reach to God."

3. For Thou hadst [didst] cast me into the deep. Jonah continues to describe the extremity of peril, from which God had already delivered him. Sweet is the memory of perils past. For they speak of God's Fatherly care. Sweet is it to the Prophet to tell God of His mercies ; but this is sweet only to the holy ; for God's mercy convicts the careless of ingratitude. Jonah then tells God, how He had cast him vehemently forth into the eddying<sup>11</sup> depth, where, when Pharaoh's army sank like a stone<sup>12</sup>, they never rose, and that, in the heart or centre of the seas, whence no strong swimmer could escape to shore. The floods or flood, [lit. river,] the sea with its currents, surrounded him, encompassing him on all sides ; and, above, tossed its multitudinous waves, passing over him, like an army trampling one prostrate under foot. Jonah remembered well the temple-psalms, and, using their words, united himself with those other worshippers who sang them, and taught us how to speak them to God. The sons of Korah<sup>13</sup> had poured out to God in these self-same words the sorrows which oppressed them. The rolling billows<sup>14</sup> and the breakers<sup>15</sup>, which, as they burst upon the rocks, shiver the vessel and crush man, are, he says to God, Thine, fulfilling Thy Will on me.

4. I am cast out of Thy sight, lit. from before Thine eyes. Jonah had wilfully withdrawn from standing in God's presence. Now God had taken him at his word, and, as it seemed, cast him out of it. David had said in his haste, I am cut off. Jonah substitutes the stronger word, I am cast forth<sup>16</sup>, driven forth, expelled, like the mire and dirt<sup>17</sup> which the waves drive along, or like the waves themselves in their restless motion<sup>18</sup>, or the heathen (the word is the same) whom God had driven out before Israel<sup>19</sup>, or as Adam from Paradise<sup>20</sup>.

Yet [Only] I will look again. He was, as it were, a cast-away, cast out of God's sight, unheeded by Him, his prayers unheard; the storm unabated, until he was cast forth. He could no longer look with the bodily eye even towards the land where God shewed the marvels of His mercy, and the Temple where God was worshipped continually. Yet what he could not do in the body, he would do in his soul. This was his only resource. "If I be cast away, this one thing will I do, I will still look to God." Magnificent faith! Humanly speaking, all hope was gone, for, when that huge vessel could scarcely live in the sea, how should a man? when God had given it no rest, while it contained Jonah, how should He will that Jonah should escape? Nay, God had hidden His Face from him; yet he did this one, this only thing; only this, "once more, still I will add to look to God." Thitherward would he look, so long as his mind yet remained in him. If his soul parted from him, it should go forth from him in that gaze. God gave him no hope, save that He preserved him alive. For he seemed to himself forsaken of God. Wonderful pattern of faith which gains strength even from God's seeming desertion! "I am cast vehemently forth from before Thine eyes; yet this one thing will I do; mine eyes shall be unto Thee, O Lord." The Israelites, as we see from Solomon's dedication-prayer, prayed toward the temple<sup>1</sup>, where God had set His Name and shewn His glory, where were the sacrifices which foreshadowed the Great Atonement. Thitherward they looked in prayer, as Christians, of old, prayed towards the East, the seat of our ancient Paradise, where our Lord shall appear unto them that look for Him, a second time unto salvation<sup>2</sup>. Toward that Temple then he would yet look with fixed eye<sup>3</sup> for help, where God, Who fills heaven and earth, shewed Himself to sinners reconciled.

5. The waters compassed me about even to the soul. Words which to others were figures of distress, the waters have come even to the soul, were to Jonah realities. Sunk in the deep seas, the water strove to penetrate at every opening. To draw breath, which sustains life, to him would have been death. There was but a breath between him and death. The deep encompassed me, encircling, meeting him whithersoever he turned, holding him imprisoned on every side, so that there was no escape, and, if there otherwise had been, he was bound motionless, the weed was wrapped around my head, like a grave-band. The weed was the well-known sea-weed, which, even near the surface of the sea where man can struggle, twines round him, a peril even to the strong swimmer, entangling him often the more, the more he struggles to extricate himself from it. But to one below, powerless to struggle, it was as his winding-sheet.

6. I went down to the bottoms, [lit. the cuttings off] of the mountains, the "roots" as the Chaldee<sup>4</sup> and we call them, the hidden rocks, which the mountains push out, as it were, into the sea, and in which they end. Such hidden rocks extend along the whole length of that coast<sup>6</sup>. These were his dungeon-walls; the earth, her bars, those long submarine reefs of rock, his prison-bars, were around him for ever: the sea-weeds were his chains: and, even thus, when things were at their uttermost, Thou hast brought up my life from corruption, to which his body would have fallen a prey, had not God sent the fish to deliver him. The deliverance for which he thanks God is altogether past: Thou broughtest me up. He calls the Lord, my God, because, being the God of all, He was especially his God, for whom He had done things of such marvellous love. God loves each soul which He has made with the same infinite love with which He loves all. Whence S. Paul says of Jesus<sup>7</sup>, Who loved me and gave Himself for me. He loves each, with the same undivided love, as if He had created none besides; and He allows each to say, My God, as if the Infinite God belonged wholly to each. So would He teach us the oneness of union between the soul which God loves and which admits His love, and Himself.

7. When my soul fainted, lit. was covered, within me, was dizzied, overwhelmed. The word is used of actual faintness from heat<sup>8</sup>, thirst<sup>9</sup>, exhaustion<sup>10</sup>, when a film comes over the eyes, and the brain is, as it were, mantled over. The soul of the pious never is so full of God, as when all things else fade from him. Jonah could not but have remembered God in the tempest; when the lots were cast; when he adjudged himself to be cast forth. But when it came to the utmost, then he says, I remembered the Lord, as though, in the intense thought of God then, all his former thought of God had been forgetfulness. So it is in every strong act of faith, of love, of prayer; its former state seems unworthy of the name of faith, love, prayer. It believes, loves, prays, as though all before had been forgetfulness.

And my prayer came in unto Thee. No sooner had he so prayed, than God heard. Jonah had thought himself cast out of His sight; but his prayer entered in thither. His holy temple is doubtless His actual Temple, whitherward he prayed. God, Who is wholly everywhere but the whole of Him nowhere, was as much in the Temple as in heaven; and had manifested Himself to Israel in their degree in the Temple, as to the blessed saints and angels in heaven.

8. They that observe lying vanities, i. e. (by the force of the Hebrew form<sup>11</sup>) that diligently watch, pay deference to, court, sue, vanities of vanities, vain things, which prove themselves vain at last, failing the hopes which trust in them. Such were actual idols, in which men openly professed that they trusted. Such are all things in which men trust, out of God. One is not more vain than another. All have this common principle of vanity, that men look, out of God, to whole length of the coast. It is thought that the sharp rocks which pierce to the surface of the sea are the remains of the Isle Paris, mentioned by Pliny v. 31.<sup>12</sup> Mialin, Les Saints Lieux, ii. 137.

that which has its only existence or permanence from God. It is then one general maxim, including all men's idols, idols of the flesh, idols of intellect, idols of ambition, idols of pride, idols of self and self-will. Men observe them, as gods, watch them, hang upon them, never lose sight of them, guard them as though they could keep them. But what are they? lying vanities, breath and wind, which none can grasp or detain, vanishing like air into air. And what do they who so observe them? All alike forsake their own mercy; i. e. God, "Whose property is, always to have mercy," and Who would be Mercy to them, if they would. So David calls God, my Mercy<sup>1</sup>. Abraham's servant and Naomi praise God, that He hath not forsaken His mercy<sup>2</sup>. Jonah does not, in this, exclude himself. His own idol had been his false love for his country, that he would not have his people go into captivity, when God would; would not have Nineveh preserved, the enemy of his country; and by leaving his office, he left his God, forsook his own Mercy. See how God speaks of Himself, as wholly belonging to them, who are His. He calls Himself their own Mercy. "He saith not, they who do vanities, (for 'vanity of vanities, and all things are vanity) lest he should seem to condemn all, and to deny mercy to the whole human race; but they who observe, guard vanities, or lies; they, into the affections of whose hearts those vanities have entered; who not only do vanities, but who guard them, as loving them, deeming that they have found a treasure—These forsake their own Mercy. Although mercy be offended, (and under Mercy we may understand God Himself, for God is 'gracious and full of compassion; slow to anger and of great mercy.) yet He doth not forsake, doth not abhor, those who guard vanities, but awaiteth that they should return: these contrariwise, of their own will, forsake Mercy standing and offering Itself."

9. But [And] with the voice of thanksgiving will I [would I fain] sacrifice unto Thee; what I have vowed, I would pay. He does not say, I will; for it did not depend upon him. Without a further miracle of God, he could do nothing. But he says, that he would never more forsake God. The law appointed sacrifices of thanksgiving<sup>3</sup>; these he would offer, not in act only, but with words of praise. He would pay what he had vowed, and chiefly himself, his life which God had given back to him, the obedience of his remaining life, in all things. For <sup>4</sup>he that keepeth the law bringeth offerings enough; he that taketh heed to the commandments offereth a peace-offering. Jonah neglects neither the outward nor the inward part, neither the body nor the soul of the commandment.

Salvation is of [lit. to] the Lord. It is wholly His; all belongs to Him, so that none can share in bestowing it; none can have any hope, save from Him. He uses an intensive form, as though he would say, strong mighty salvation<sup>5</sup>. God seems often to wait for the full resignation of the soul, all its powers and will to Him. Then He can shew mercy healthfully, when the soul is wholly surrendered to Him. So, on this full confession, Jonah is restored. The Prophet's prayer ends almost in promising the same as the mariners. They made vows; Jonah says, I will pay that I have vowed. Devoted service in the creature is one and the same, although diverse in degree; and so, that Israel might not despise the heathen, he tacitly likens the act of the new heathen converts and that of the Prophet.

11. And the Lord spake unto the fish. <sup>9</sup> Wind and storm fulfil His word. The irrational creatures have wills. God had commanded the Prophet, and he disobeyed. God, in some way, commanded the fish. He laid His will upon it, and the fish forthwith obeyed; a pattern to the Prophet when He released him. "God's Will, that anythings should be completed, is law and fulfilment and hath the power of law. Not that Almighty God commanded the fish, as He doth us or the Holy Angels, uttering in its mind what is to be done, or inserting into the heart the knowledge of what He chooseth. But if He be said to command irrational animals or elements or any part of the creation, this signifieth the law and command of His Will. For all things yield to His Will, and the mode of their obedience is to us altogether ineffable, but known to Him." "Jonah," says S. Chrysostome, "fled the land, and fled not the displeasure of God. He fled the land, and brought a tempest on the sea: and not only himself gained no good from flight, but brought into extreme peril those also who took him on board. When he sailed, seated in the vessel, with sailors and pilot and all the tackling, he was in the extremest peril: when, sunk in the sea, the sin punished and laid aside, he entered that vast vessel, the fish's belly, he enjoyed great fearlessness; that thou mayest learn that, as no ship availeth to one living in sin, so when freed from sin, neither sea destroyeth, nor beasts consume. The waves received him, and choked him not; the vast fish received him and destroyed him not; but both the huge animal and the element gave back their deposit safe to God, and by all things the Prophet learnt to be mild and tender, not to be more cruel than the untaught mariners or wild waves or animals. For the sailors did not give him up at first, but after manifold constraint; and the sea and the wild animal guarded him with much benevolence, God disposing all these things. He returned then, preached, threatened, persuaded, saved, awed, amended, stablished, through that one first preaching. For he needed not many days, nor continuous exhortation: but, speaking those words, he brought all to repentance. Wherefore God did not lead him straight from the vessel to the city; but the sailors gave him over to the sea, the sea to the vast fish, the fish to God, God to the Ninevites, and through this long circuit brought back the fugitive; that He might instruct all, that it is impossible to escape the Hands of God. For come where a man may, dragging sin after him, he will undergo countless troubles. Though man be not there, nature itself on all sides will oppose him with great vehemence."

"<sup>12</sup> Since the elect too at times strive to be sharp-witted, it is well to bring forward another wise man, and shew how the craft of mortal man is comprehended in the Inward Counsels. For Jonah wished to exercise a prudent sharpness of wit, when, being sent to preach repentance to the Ninevites, in that he feared that, if the Gentiles were chosen, Judæa would be forsaken, he refused to discharge the office of preaching. He sought a ship, chose to flee to Tarshish; but forthwith a tempest arises, the lot is cast, to know for whose fault the sea was troubled. Jonah is taken in his fault, plunged in the deep, swallowed by the fish, and carried by the vast beast thither whither he set at naught the command to go. See how the tempest found God's runaway, the lot binds him, the sea receives him, the beast encloses him, and, because he sets himself against obeying his Maker, he is carried a culprit by his prison-house to the place whither he had been sent. When God commanded, man would not minister the prophecy; when God enjoined, the beast cast forth the Prophet. The Lord then taketh the wise in their own craftiness, when He bringeth back to the service of His own Will, that whereby man's will contradicts Him." "1 Jonah, fleeing from the perils of preaching and salvation of souls, fell into peril of his own life. When, in the ship, he took on himself the peril of all, he saved both himself and the ship. He fled as a man; he exposed himself to peril, as a prophet." "2 Let them think so, who are sent by God or by a superior to preach to heretics or to heathen. When God calleth to an office or condition whose object it is to live for the salvation of others, He gives grace and means necessary or expedient to this end. For so the sweet and careful ordering of His Providence requireth.—Greater peril awaiteth us from God our Judge, if we flee His calling as did Jonah, if we use not the talents entrusted to us to do His Will and to His glory. We know the parable of the servant who buried the talent, and was condemned by the Lord."

And it vomited out Jonah. Unwilling, but constrained, it cast him forth, as a burden to it. "3 From the lowest depths of death, Life came forth victorious." "4 He is swallowed by the fish, but is not consumed; and then calls upon God, and (marvell!) on the third day is given back with Christ." "6 What it prefigured, that that vast animal on the third day gave back alive the Prophet which it had swallowed, no need to ask of us, since Christ explained it. As then Jonah passed from the ship into the fish's belly, so Christ from the wood into the tomb or the depth of death. And as he for those imperilled in the tempest, so Christ for those tempest-tost in this world. And as Jonah was first enjoined to preach to the Ninevites, but the preaching of Jonah did not reach them before the fish cast him forth, so prophecy was sent beforehand to the Gentiles, but did not reach them until after the resurrection of Christ." "6 Jonah prophesied of Christ, not so much in words as by a suffering of his own; yet more openly than if he had proclaimed by speech His Death and Resurrection. For why was he received into the fish's belly, and given back the third day, except to signify that Christ would on the third day return from the deep of hell?"

S. Irenæus looks on the history of Jonah as the imaging of man's own history. "7 *As He allowed Jonah to be swallowed by the whale, not that he should perish altogether, but that, being vomited forth, he might the more be subdued to God, and the more glorify God Who had given him such unlooked-for deliverance, and bring those Ninevites to solid repentance, converting them to the Lord Who would free them from death, terrified by that sign which befel Jonah (as Scripture says of them, They turned every man from his evil way, &c. . . . ) so from the beginning, God allowed man to be swallowed up by that vast Cetos who was the author of the transgression, not that he should altogether perish, but preparing a way of salvation, which, as foresignified by the word in Jonah, was* formed for those who had the like faith as to the Lord as Jonah, and with him confessed, I fear the Lord, &c. that so man, receiving from God unlooked-for salvation, might rise from the dead and glorify God, &c. . . . This was the longsuffering of God, that man might pass through all, and acknowledge his ways; then, coming to the resurrection and knowing by trial from what he had been delivered, might be for ever thankful to God, and, having received from Him the gift of incorruption, might love Him more (for he to whom much is forgiven, loveth much) and know himself, that he is mortal and weak, and understand the Lord, that He is in such wise Mighty and Immortal, that to the mortal He can give immortality and to the things of time eternity."

III. 1. And the word of the Lord came a second time to Jonah. "8 Jonah, delivered from the whale, doubtless went up to Jerusalem to pay his vows and thank God there. Perhaps he hoped that God would be content with this his punishment and repentance, and that He would not again send him to Nineveh." Any how he was in some settled home, perhaps again at Gathhepher. For God bids him, Arise, go. "9 But one who is on his way, is not bidden to arise and go." God may have allowed an interval to elapse, in order that the tidings of so great a miracle might spread far and wide. But Jonah does not supply any of these incidents<sup>10</sup>. He does not speak of himself<sup>10</sup>, but of his mission only, as God taught him.

2. Arise, go to Nineveh that great city, and preach [or cry] unto it. God says to Jonah the self-same words which He had said before; only perhaps He gives him an intimation of His purpose of mercy, in that He says no more, cry against her, but cry unto her. He might cry against one doomed to destruction; to cry unto her, seems to imply that she had some interest in, and so some hope from, this cry. The preaching that I bid thee. This is the only notice which Jonah relates that God took of his disobedience, in that He charged him to obey exactly what He commanded. "11 He does not say to him, why didst thou not what I commanded?" He had rebuked him in deed; He amended him and upbraided him not. "11 The rebuke of that shipwreck and the swallowing by the fish sufficed, so that he who had not felt the Lord commanding, might understand Him, delivering." Jonah might have seemed unworthy to be again inspired by God. But whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth; whom He chasteneth, He loveth. "12 The hard discipline, the severity and length of the scourge, were the earnest of a great trust and a high destination." He knew him to be changed into another man, and, by one of His most special favours, gives him that same trust which he had before deserted. "9 As Christ, when risen, commended His sheep to Peter, wiser now and more fervent, so to Jonah risen He commends the conversion of Nineveh. For so did Christ risen bring about the conversion of the heathen, by sending His Apostles, each into large provinces, as Jonah was sent alone to a large city." "13 He bids him declare not only the sentence of God, but in the self-same words; not to consider his own estimation or the ears of his hearers, nor to mingle soothing with severe words, and convey the message ingeniously, but with all freedom and severity to declare openly what was commanded him. This plainness, though, may be, less acceptable to people or princes, is oftentimes more useful, always more approved by God. Nothing should be more sacred to the preacher of God's word, than truth and simplicity and inviolable sanctity in delivering it. Now alas, all this is changed into vain show at the will of the multitude and the breath of popular favour."

3. And Jonah arose and went unto Nineveh, as ready to obey, as before to disobey. Before, when God said those same words, he arose and fled; now, he arose and went. True conversion shews the same energy in serving God, as the unconverted had before shewn in serving self or error. Saul's spirit of fire, which persecuted Christ, gleamed in S. Paul like lightning through the world, to win souls to Him.

Nineveh was an exceeding great city; lit. great to God, i.e. what would not only appear great to man who admires things of no account, but what, being really great, is so in the judgment of God Who cannot be deceived. God did account it great, Who says to Jonah, Should not I spare Nineveh that great city, which hath more than six score thousand that cannot discern between their right hand and their left? It is a different idiom from that, when Scripture speaks of the mountains of God, the cedars of God. For of these it speaks, as having their firmness or their beauty from God as their Author.

Of three days' journey, i.e. sixty miles in circumference. It was a great city. Jonah speaks of its greatness, under a name which he would only have used of real greatness. Varied accounts agree in ascribing this size to Nineveh<sup>1</sup>. An Eastern city enclosing often, as did Babylon, ground under tillage, the only marvel is, that such a space was enclosed by walls. Yet this too is no marvel, when we know from inscriptions, what masses of human strength the great empires of old had at their command, or of the more than threescore pyramids of Egypt<sup>2</sup>. In population it was far inferior to our metropolis, of which, as of the suburbs of Rome of old, "one would hesitate to say, where the city ended, where it began. The suburban parts are so joined on to the city itself, and give the spectator the idea of boundless length." An Eastern would the more naturally think of the circumference of a city, because of the broad places, similar to the boulevards of Paris, which encircled it, so that men could walk around it, within it. "The buildings," it is related of Babylon, "are not brought close to the walls, but are at about the distance of an acre from them. And not even the whole city did they occupy with houses; 80 furlongs are inhabited, and not even all these continuously, I suppose because it seemed safer to live scattered in several places. The rest they sow and till, that, if any foreign force threaten them, the besieged may be supplied with food from the soil of the city itself." Not Babylon alone was spoken of, of old, as "having the circumference of a nation rather than of a city."

haps the day's journey enabled him to traverse the city from end to end, with his one brief, deep cry of woe; Yet forty days and Nineveh overthrown<sup>6</sup>. He prophesied an utter overthrow, a turning it upside down<sup>7</sup>. He does not speak of it as to happen at a time beyond those days. The close of the forty days and the destruction were to be one. He does not say strictly, Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown, but, Yet forty days and Nineveh overthrown. The last of those forty days was, ere its sun was set, to see Nineveh as a thing overthrown. Jonah knew from the first God's purpose of mercy to Nineveh; he had a further hint of it in the altered commission which he had received. It is perhaps hinted in the word Yet. "If God had meant unconditionally to overthrow them, He would have overthrown them without notice. Yet, always denotes some long-suffering of God." But, taught by that severe discipline, he discharges his office strictly. He cries, what God had bidden him to cry, without reserve or exception. The sentence, as are all God's threatenings until the last, was conditional. But God does not say this. That sentence was now within forty days of its completion; yet even thus it was remitted. Wonderful encouragement, when one Lent sufficed to save some six hundred thousand souls from perishing! Yet the first visitation of the Cholera was checked in its progress in England, upon one day's national fast and humiliation; and we have seen how general prayer has oftentimes at once opened or closed the heavens as we needed. "A few years ago," relates S. Augustine<sup>8</sup>, "when Arcadius was Emperor at Constantinople (what I say, some have heard, some of our people were present there,) did not God, willing to terrify the city, and, by terrifying, to amend, convert, cleanse, change it, reveal to a faithful servant of His (a soldier, it is said), that the city should perish by fire from heaven, and warned him to tell the Bishop! It was told. The Bishop despised it not, but addressed the people. The city turned to the mourning of penitence, as that Nineveh of old. Yet lest men should think that he who said this, deceived or was deceived, the day which God had threatened, came. When all were intently expecting the issue with great fears, at the beginning of night as the world was being darkened, a fiery cloud was seen from the East, small at first, then, as it approached the city, gradually enlarging, until it hung terribly over the whole city. All fled to the Church; the place did not hold the people.—But after that great tribulation, when God had accredited His word, the cloud began to diminish and at last disappeared. The people, freed from fear for a while, again heard that they must migrate, because the whole city should be destroyed on the next sabbath. The whole people left the city with the Emperor; no one remained in his house.—That multitude, having gone some miles, when gathered in one spot to pour forth prayer to God, suddenly saw a great smoke, and sent forth a loud cry to God." The city was saved. "What shall we say?" adds S. Augustine. "Was this the anger of God, or rather His mercy? Who doubts that the most merciful Father will be terrified by terrifying to convert, not to punish by destroying? As the hand is lifted up to strike, and is recalled in pity, when he who was to be struck is terrified, so was it done to that city." Will any of God's warnings now move our great Babylon to repentance, that it be not ruined?

5. And the people of Nineveh believed God; strictly, believed in God. To believe in God expresses more heart-belief, than to believe God in itself need convey. To believe God is to believe what God says, to be true; to believe in or on God expresses not belief only, but that belief resting in God, trusting itself and all its concerns with Him. It combines hope and trust with faith, and love too, since, without love, there cannot be trust. They believed then the preaching of Jonah, and that He, in Whose Name Jonah spake, had all power in heaven and earth. But they believed further in His unknown mercies; they cast themselves upon the goodness of the hitherto unknown God. Yet they believed in Him, as the Supreme God, the object of awe, the God (Elohim<sup>1</sup>, Haelohim<sup>2</sup>), although they knew Him not, as He Is<sup>3</sup>, the Self-Existent. Jonah does not say how they were thus persuaded. God the Holy Ghost relates the wonders of God's Omnipotence as common every-day things. They are no marvels to Him Who wrought them. He commanded and they were done. He spake with power to the hearts which He had made, and they were turned to Him. Any human means are secondary, utterly powerless, except in His hands Who Alone doth all things through whomsoever He doth them. Our Lord tells us that Jonah himself was a sign unto the Ninevites<sup>4</sup>. Whether then the mariners spread the history<sup>5</sup>, or howsoever the Ninevites knew the personal history of Jonah, he, in his own person and in what befell him, was a sign to them. They believed that God, Who avenged his disobedience, would avenge their's. They believed perhaps, that God must have some great mercy in store for them, Who not only sent His Prophet so far from his own land to them who had never owned, never worshipped Him, but had done such mighty wonders to subdue His Prophet's resistance and to make him go to them.

And proclaimed a fast and put on sackcloth. It was not then a repentance in word only, but in deed. A fast was at that time entire abstinence from all food till evening; the hair-cloth was a harsh garment, irritating and afflictive to the body. They who did so, were (as we may still see from the Assyrian sculptures) men of pampered and luxurious habits, uniting sensuality and fierceness. Yet this they did at once, and as it seems, for the 40 days. They proclaimed a fast. They did not wait for the supreme authority. Time was urgent, and they would lose none of it. In this imminent peril of God's displeasure, they acted as men would in a conflagration. Men do not wait for orders to put out a fire, if they can, or to prevent it from spreading. Whoever they were who proclaimed it, whether those in inferior authority, each in his neighbourhood, or whether it spread from man to man, as the tidings spread, it was done at once. It seems to have been done by acclamation, as it were, one common cry out of the one common terror. For it is said of them, as one succession of acts, the men of

Nineveh believed in God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth from their great to their little, every age, sex, condition. "Worthy of admiration is that exceeding celerity and diligence in taking counsel, which, although in the same city with the king, perceived that they must provide for the common and imminent calamity, not waiting to ascertain laboriously the king's pleasure." In a city, 60 miles in circumference, some time must needs be lost, before the king could be approached; and we know, in some measure, the forms required in approaching Eastern monarchs of old.

6. For word came, rather, And the matter<sup>7</sup> came, i. e. the "whole account," as we say. The word, word, throughout Holy Scripture, as in so many languages, stands for that which is reported of<sup>8</sup>. The whole account, viz. how this stranger, in strange austere attire, had come, what had happened to him before he came, how he preached, how the people had believed him, what they had done, as had just been related, came to the king. The form of words implies that what Jonah relates in this verse took place after what had been mentioned before. People are slow to carry to sovereigns matters of distress, in which they cannot help. This was no matter of peril from man, in which the counsel or energy of the king could be of use. Any how it came to him last. But when it came to him, he disdained not to follow the example of those below him. He was not jealous of his prerogative, or that his advice had not been had; but, in the common peril, acted as his subjects had, and humbled himself as they did. Yet this king was the king of Nineveh, the king, whose name was dreaded far and wide, whose will none who disputed, prospered. "He who was accounted and was the greatest of the kings of the earth, was not held back by any thought of his own splendour, greatness or dignity, from fleeing as a suppliant to the mercy of God, and inciting others by his example to the same earnestness." The kings of Assyria were religious, according to their light. They ascribed all their victories to their god, Asshur<sup>9</sup>. When the king came to hear of One Who had a might, such as he had not seen, he believed in Him.

And he arose from his throne. He lost no time; he heard, and he arose. "It denotes great earnestness, haste, diligence." And he laid his robe from him. This was the large costly upper garment, so called from its amplitude<sup>10</sup>. It is the name of the goodly Babylonian garment<sup>11</sup> which Achan coveted. As worn by kings, it was the most magnificent part of their dress, and a special part of their state. Kings were buried as they lived, in splendid apparel<sup>12</sup>; and rich adornments were buried with them<sup>13</sup>. The king of Nineveh dreads no charge of precipitancy nor man's judgement. "He exchanges purple, gold, garments for the simple rough and sordid sackcloth, and his throne for the most abject ashes, the humblest thing he could do, fulfilling a deeper degree of humility than is related of the people." Strange credulity, had Jonah's message not been true; strange madness of unbelief which does not repent when a Greater than Jonah cries<sup>14</sup>, Repent ye, for the kingdom of hea- ven is at hand. Strange garb for the king, in the eyes of a luxurious age; acceptable in His Who said<sup>1</sup>, if the mighty works which have been done in you had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes. “<sup>2</sup> Many wish to repent, yet so as not to part with their luxuries or the vanity of their dress, like the Greek who said he would ‘like to be a philosopher, yet in a few things, not altogether.’ To whom we may answer, ‘delicate food and costly dress agree not with penitence; and that is no great grief which never comes to light.’” “<sup>3</sup> It was a marvellous thing, that purple was outvied by sackcloth. Sackcloth availed, what the purple robe availed not. What the diadem accomplished not, the ashes accomplished. Seest thou, I said not groundlessly that we should fear, not fasting but drunkenness and satiety? For drunkenness and satiety shook the city through and through, and were about to overthrow it; when it was reeling and about to fall, fasting established it.” “<sup>4</sup> The king had conquered enemies by valour; he conquered God by humility. Wise king, who, for the saving of his people, owns himself a sinner rather than a king. He forgets that he is a king, fearing God, the King of all; he remembereth not his own power, coming to own the power of the Godhead. Marvellous! While he remembereth not that he is a king of men, he beginneth to be a king of righteousness. The prince, becoming religious, lost not his empire but changed it. Before, he held the principedom of military discipline; now, he obtained the principedom in heavenly disciplines.”

7. And he caused it to be proclaimed and published through Nineveh; lit. And he cried and said, &c. The cry or proclamation of the king corresponded with the cry of Jonah. Where the Prophet’s cry, calling to repentance, had reached, the proclamation of the king followed, obeying. By the decree of the king and his nobles. This is a hint of the political state of Nineveh, beyond what we have elsewhere. It was not then an absolute monarchy. At least, the king strengthened his command by that of his nobles, as Darius the Mede sealed the den of lions, into which Daniel was cast, with the signet of his lords as well as his own<sup>5</sup>, that the purpose might not be changed concerning him.

Let neither man nor beast, &c. “<sup>6</sup> Are brutes too then to fast, horses and mules to be clothed with sackcloth? Yes, he says. For as, when a rich man dies, his relatives clothe not only the men and maidservants, but the horses too with sackcloth, and, giving them to the grooms, bid that they should follow to the tomb, in token of the greatness of the calamity and inviting all to sympathy, so also when that city was about to perish, they clad the brute natures in sackcloth, and put them under the yoke of fasting. The irrational animals cannot, through words, learn the anger of God; let them learn through hunger, that the infliction is from God: for if, he says, the city should be overthrown, it would be one grave of us the inhabitants and of them also.” It was no arbitrary nor wanton nor careless act of the king of Nineveh to make the dumb animals share in the common fast. It proceeded probably from an indistinct consciousness that God cared for them also, and, that they were not guilty. So the Psalmist looked on God’s care of His creatures as a fresh ground for man’s trust in Him<sup>7</sup>, O Lord, Thou preservest man and beast: How excellent is Thy loving-kindness, O Lord, therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of Thy wings. As our Lord teaches that God’s care of the sparrows is a pledge to man of God’s minute unceasing care for him, so the Ninevites felt truly that the cry of the poor brutes would be heard by God. And God confirmed that judgment, when He told Jonah of the much cattle<sup>8</sup>, as a ground for having pity on Nineveh. The moanings and lowings of the animals, their voices of distress, pierce man’s heart too, and must have added to his sense of the common misery. Ignorance or pride of human nature alone could think that man’s sorrow is not aided by these objects of sense. Nature was truer in the king of Nineveh.

8. Let man and beast be covered with sackcloth. The gorgeous caparisons of horses mules and camels was part of Eastern magnificence. Who knows not how man’s pride is fed by the sleekness of his stud, their “well-appointed” trappings? Man, in his luxury and pride, would have everything reflect his glory, and minister to pomp. Self-humiliation would have everything reflect its lowliness. Sorrow would have everything answer to its sorrow. Men think it strange that the horses at Nineveh were covered with sackcloth, and forget how, at the funerals of the rich, black horses are chosen and are clothed with black velvet.

And cry unto God mightily, “with might which conquereth judgement.” A faint prayer does not express a strong desire, nor obtain what it does not strongly ask for, as having only half a heart.

And let them turn, every man from his evil way. “<sup>9</sup> See what removed that inevitable wrath. Did fasting and sackcloth alone? No, but the change of the whole life. How does this appear? From the Prophet’s word itself. For he who spake of the wrath of God and of their fast, himself mentions the reconciliation and its cause. And God saw their works. What works? that they fasted? that they put on sackcloth? He passes by these, and says, that every one turned from his evil ways, and God repented of the evil which He had said that He would do unto them. Seest thou, that not the fast plucked them from the peril, but the change of life made God propitious to these heathen. I say this, not that we should dishonour, but that we may honour fasting. For the honour of a fast is not in abstinence from food, but in avoidance of sin. So that he who limiteth fasting to the abstinence from food only, he it is, who above all dishonoureth it. Fastest thou? Shew it me by its works. ‘What works?’ askest thou? If you see a poor man, have mercy; if an enemy, be reconciled; if a friend doing well, envy him not; if a beautiful woman, pass on. Let not the mouth alone fast; let eyes too, and hearing and feet, and hands, and all the members of our bodies. Let the hands fast, clean from rapine and avarice! let the feet fast, holding back from going to unlawful sights! let the eyes fast, learning never to thrust themselves on beautiful objects, nor to look curiously on others’ beauty; for the food of the eye is

He says, each from his evil way, because, in the general mass of corruption, each man has his own special heart's-sin. All were to return, but by forsaking, each, one by one, his own habitual favourite sin.

And from the violence. Violence is singled out as the special sin of Nineveh, out of all their evil way; as the Angel saith<sup>1</sup>, tell His disciples and Peter. This was the giant, Goliath-sin. When this should be effaced, the rest would give way, as the Philistines fled, when their champion was fallen to the earth dead. That is in their hands, lit. in their palms<sup>2</sup>, the hollow of their hand. The hands being the instruments alike of using violence and of grasping its fruits, the violence cleaves to them in both ways, in its guilt and in its gains. So Job and David say<sup>3</sup>, while there was no violence in my hands; and Isaiah<sup>4</sup>, the work of wickedness is in their hands. Repentance and restitution clear the hands from the guilt of the violence: restitution, which gives back what was wronged; repentance, which, for love of God, hates and quits the sins, of which it repents. "Keep the winning, keep the sinning." The fruits of sin are temporal gain, eternal loss. We cannot keep the gain and escape the loss. Whoso keeps the gain of sin, loves it in its fruits, and will have them, all of them. The Hebrews had a saying, "Whoso hath stolen a beam, and used it in building a great tower, must pull down the whole tower and restore the beam to its owner," i. e. restitution must be made at any cost. "He," they say<sup>5</sup>, "who confesses a sin and does not restore the thing stolen, is like one who holds a reptile in his hands, who, if he were washed with all the water in the world, would never be purified, till he cast it out of his hands; when he has done this, the first sprinkling cleanses him."

2. Who can tell if God will turn and repent? The Ninevites use the same form of words, which God suggested by Joel to Judah. Perhaps He would thereby indicate that He had Himself put it into their mouths. "In uncertainty they repented, and obtained certain mercy." "It is therefore left uncertain, that men, being doubtful of their salvation, may repent the more vehemently and the more draw down on themselves the mercy of God." "Most certain are the promises of God, whereby He has promised pardon to the penitent. And yet the sinner may well be uncertain whether he have obtained that penitence which makes him the object of those promises, not a servile repentance for fear of punishment, but true contrition out of the love of God." And so by this uncertainty, while, with the fear of hell, there is mingled the fear of the loss of God, the fear of that loss, which in itself involves some love, is, by His grace, turned into a contrite love, as the terrified soul thinks Who He is, Whom it had all but lost, Whom, it knows not whether it may not lose. In the case of the Ninevites, the remission of the temporal and eternal punishment was bound up in one, since the only punishment which pent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not?

God had threatened was temporal, and if this was forgiven, that forgiveness was a token that His displeasure had ceased.

"<sup>10</sup> They know not the issue, yet they neglect not repentance. They are unacquainted with the method of the loving-kindness of God, and they are changed amid uncertainty. They had no other Ninevites to look to, who had repented and been saved. They had not read the Prophets nor heard the Patriarchs, nor benefited by counsel, nor partaken of instruction, nor had they persuaded themselves that they should altogether propitiate God by repentance. For the threat did not contain this. But they doubted and hesitated about this, and yet repented with all carefulness. What account then shall we give, when these, who had no good hopes held out to them as to the issue, gave evidence of such a change, and thou, who mayest be of good cheer as to God's love for men, and hast many times received many pledges of His care, and hast heard the Prophets and Apostles, and hast been instructed by the events themselves, strivest not to attain the same measure of virtue as they? Great then was the virtue too of these men, but much greater the loving-kindness of God; and this you may see from the very greatness of the threat. For on this ground did He not add to the sentence, 'but if ye repent, I will spare,' that, casting among them the sentence unconditioned, He might increase the fear, and, increasing the fear, might impel them the more speedily to repentance." "<sup>11</sup> That fear was the parent of salvation; the threat removed the peril; the sentence of overthrow stayed the overthrow. New and marvellous issue! The sentence threatening death was the parent of life. Contrary to secular judgment, the sentence lost its force, when passed. In secular courts, the passing of the sentence gives it validity. Contrariwise with God, the pronouncing of the sentence made it invalid. For had it not been pronounced, the sinners had not heard it: had they not heard it, they would not have repented, would not have averted the chastisement, would not have enjoyed that marvellous deliverance. They fled not the city, as we do now [from the earthquake], but, remaining, established it. It was a snare, and they made it a wall; a quicksand and precipice, and they made it a tower of safety."

"<sup>11</sup> Was Nineveh destroyed? Quite the contrary. It arose and became more glorious, and all this intervening time has not effaced its glory, and we all yet celebrate it and marvel at it, that thenceforth it has become a most safe harbour to all who sin, not allowing them to sink into despair, but calling all to repentance, both by what it did and by what it gained from the Providence of God, persuading us never to despair of our salvation, but living the best we can, and setting before us a good hope, to be of good cheer that the end will any how be good." "<sup>12</sup> What was Nineveh? They ate, they drank; they bought, they sold; they planted, they builded; they gave themselves up to perjuries, lies, drunkenness, enormities, corruptions. This was Nineveh. Look at Nineveh now. They mourn, they grieve, are saddened, in sackcloth and ashes, in fastings and prayers. Where is that Nineveh? It is overthrown."

them ; He did not then first see their sackcloth when they covered themselves with it. He had seen them long before He sent the Prophet thither, while Israel was slaying the prophets who announced to them the captivity which hung over them. He knew certainly, that if He were to send the prophets far off to the Gentiles with such an announcement, they would hear and repent." God saw them, looked upon them, approved them, accepted the Ninevites not for time only, but, as many as persevered, for eternity. It was no common repentance. It was the penitence, which our Lord sets forth as the pattern of true repentance before His Coming. <sup>1</sup>The men of Nineveh shall rise in judgement with this generation and shall condemn it, because they repented at the preaching of Jonah, and behold a greater than Jonah is here. They believed in the One God, before unknown to them ; they humbled themselves ; they were not ashamed to repent publicly ; they used great strictness with themselves ; but, what Scripture chiefly dwells upon, their repentance was not only in profession, in belief, in outward act, but in the fruit of genuine works of repentance, a changed life out of a changed heart. God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way. Their whole way and course of life was evil ; they broke off, not the one or other sin only, but all their whole evil way. <sup>2</sup>*The Ninevites, when about to perish, appoint them a fast ; in their bodies they chasten their souls with the scourge of humility ; they put on haircloth for raiment ; for ointment they sprinkle themselves with ashes ; and, prostrate on the ground, they lick the dust.—They publish their guilt with groans and lay open their secret misdeeds. Every age and sex alike applies itself to offices of mourning ; all ornament was laid aside ; food was refused to the suckling, and the age, as yet unstained by sins of its own, bare the weight of those of others ; the dumb animals lacked their own food. One cry of unlike natures was heard along the city-walls ; along all the houses echoed the piteous lament of the mourners ; the earth bore the groans of the penitents ; heaven itself echoed with their voice. That was fulfilled ; <sup>3</sup>The prayer of the humble pierceth the clouds." <sup>4</sup>The Ninevites were converted to the fear of God, and laying aside the evil of their former life, betook themselves through repentance to virtue and righteousness, with a course of penitence so faithful, that they changed the sentence already pronounced on them by God." <sup>5</sup>As soon as prayer took possession of them, it both made them righteous, and forthwith corrected the city which had been habituated to live with profligacy and wickedness and lawlessness. More powerful was prayer than the long usage of sin. It filled that city with heavenly laws, and brought along with it temperance, lovingkindness, gentleness and care of the poor. For without these it cannot abide to dwell in the soul. Had any then entered Nineveh, who knew it well before, he would not have known the city ; so suddenly had it sprung back from life most foul to godliness."*

And God repented of the evil. This was no real change in God ; rather, the object of His threatening was, that He might not do what He threatened. God's threatenings are conditional, "unless they repent," as are His promises, "if they endure to the end." God said afterwards by Jeremiah <sup>7</sup>, At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up and to pull down and to destroy it, if that nation, against whom I had pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them.

<sup>8</sup>As God is unchangeable in nature, so is He unchangeable in Will. For no one can turn back His thoughts. For though some seem to have turned back His thoughts by their deprecations, yet this was His inward thought, that they should be able by their deprecations to turn back His sentence, and that they should receive from Him whereby to avail with Him.—When then outwardly His sentence seemeth to be changed, inwardly His counsel is unchanged, because He inwardly ordereth each thing unchangeably, whatsoever is done outwardly with change." <sup>9</sup>It is said that He repented, because He changed that which He seemed about to do, to destroy them. In God all things are disposed and fixed, nor doth He anything out of any sudden counsel, which He knew not in all eternity that He should do ; but, amid the movements of His creature in time, which He governeth marvellously, He, not moved in time, as by a sudden will, is said to do what He disposed by well-ordered causes in the immutability of His most secret counsel whereby things which come to knowledge, each in its time, He both doth when they are present, and already did when they were future." <sup>10</sup>God is subject to no dolour of repentance, nor is He deceived in anything, so as to wish to correct wherein He erred. But as man, when he repenteth willeth to change what he has done, so when thou hearest that God repenteth, look for the change. God, although He calleth it 'repenting,' doth it otherwise than thou. Thou doest it, because thou hast erred ; He, because He avengeth or freeth. He changed the kingdom of Saul when He repented. And in the very place, where Scripture saith, He repenteth, it is said a little after, He is not a man that He should repent. When then He changes His works through His unchangeable counsels, He is said to repent, on account of the change, not of the counsel, but of the act." S. Augustine thinks that God, by using this language of Himself, which all would feel to be inadequate to His Majesty, meant to teach us that all language is inadequate to His Excellences. <sup>11</sup>We say these things of God, because we do not find anything better to say. I say, 'God is just,' because in man's words I find nothing better ; for He is beyond justice. It is said in Scripture, God is just and loveth justice. But in Scripture it is said, that God repenteth, 'God is ignorant.' Who would not start back at this ? Yet to that end Scripture condescendeth healthfully to those words from which thou shrinkest, that thou shouldst not think that what thou deemest great is said worthily of Him. If thou ask, 'what then is said worthily of God ?' one may perhaps answer, that 'He is just.' Another more gifted would say, that this word too is surpassed by His Excellence, and that this too is said, not worthily of Him, although suitably according to man's capacity : so that, when he would prove out of Scripture that it is written, God is just, he may be answered rightly, that the same Scriptures say that God repenteth ; so, that, as he does not take that in its ordinary meaning, as men are wont to repent, so also when He is said to be just, this does not correspond to His supereminence, although Scripture said this also well, that, through these words such as they are, we may be brought to that which is unutterable." things which Thou art about to do? That I may not do what I predict. Wherefore also He threatened hell, that He may not bring to hell. Let words terrify you that ye may be freed from the anguish of deeds." "Men threaten punishment and inflict it. Not so God; but contrariwise, He both predicts and delays, and terrifies with words, and leaves nothing undone, that He may not bring what He threatens. So He did with the Ninevites. He bends His bow, and brandishes His sword, and prepares His spear, and inflicts not the blow. Were not the Prophet's words bow and spear and sharp sword, when he said, yet forty days and Nineveh shall be destroyed? But He discharged not the shaft; for it was prepared, not to be shot, but to be laid up."

"When we read in the Scriptures or hear in Churches the word of God, what do we hear but Christ? And behold a greater than Jonas is here. If they repented at the cry of one unknown servant, of what punishment shall not we be worthy, if, when the Lord preacheth, Whom we have known through so many benefits heaped upon us, we repent not? To them one day sufficed; to us shall so many months and years not suffice? To them the overthrow of the city was preached, and 40 days were granted for repentance: to us eternal torments are threatened, and we have not half an hour's life certain."

And He did it not. God willed rather that His prophecy should seem to fail, than that repentance should fail of its fruit. But it did not indeed fail, for the condition lay expressed in the threat. "Prophecy," says Aquinas<sup>3</sup> in reference to these cases, "cannot contain anything untrue." For "prophecy is a certain knowledge impressed on the understanding of the Prophets by revelation of God, by means of certain teaching. But truth of knowledge is the same in the Teacher and the taught, because the knowledge of the learner is a likeness of the knowledge of the Teacher. And in this way, Jerome saith that 'prophecy is a sort of sign of Divine foreknowledge.' The truth then of the prophetic knowledge and utterance must be the same as that of the Divine knowledge, in which there can be no error.—But although in the Divine Intellect, the two-fold knowledge [of things as they are in themselves, and as they are in their causes,] is always united, it is not always united in the prophetic revelation, because the impression made by the Agent is not always adequate to His power. Whence, sometimes, the prophetic revelation is a sort of impressed likeness of the Divine Foreknowledge, as it beholds the future contingent things in themselves, and these always take place as they are prophesied: as, Behold, a virgin shall conceive. But sometimes the prophetic revelation is an impressed likeness of Divine foreknowledge, as it knows the order of causes to effects; and then at times the event is other than is foretold, and yet there is nothing untrue in the prophecy. For the meaning of the prophecy is, that the disposition of the inferior causes, whether in nature or in human acts, is such, that such an effect would follow" (as in regard to Hezekiah and Nineveh), "which order of the cause to the effect is sometimes hindered by other things supervening." "The Will of God," he says again<sup>5</sup>, "being the first, universal Cause, does not exclude intermediate causes, by virtue of which certain effects are produced. And since all intermediate causes are not adequate to the power of the First Cause, there are many things in the Power, Knowledge, and Will of God, which are not contained in the order of the inferior causes, as the resurrection of Lazarus. Whence one, looking to the inferior causes, might say, 'Lazarus will not rise again:' whereas, looking to the First Divine Cause, he could say, 'Lazarus will rise again.' And each of these God willeth, viz. that a thing should take place according to the inferior cause: which shall not take place, according to the superior cause, and conversely. So that God sometimes pronounces that a thing shall be, as far as it is contained in the order of inferior causes (as according to the disposition of nature or deserts), which yet doth not take place, because it is otherwise in the superior Divine cause. As when He foretold Hezekiah, Set thy house in order, for thou shalt die and not live; which yet did not take place, because from eternity it was otherwise in the Knowledge and Will of God which is unchangeable. Whence Gregory saith<sup>7</sup>, 'though God change the thing, His counsel He doth not change.' When He saith, I will repent<sup>8</sup>, it is understood as said metaphorically; for men, when they fulfil not what they threatened, seem to repent."

IV. 1. And Jonah was displeased exceedingly. It was an untempered zeal. The Prophet himself records it as such, and how he was reprov'd for it. He would, like many of us, govern God's world better than God Himself. Short-sighted and presumptuous! Yet not more short-sighted than those who, in fact, quarrel with God's Providence, the existence of evil, the baffling of good, "the prison-walls of obstacles and trials," in what we would do for God's glory. What is all discontent, but anger with God? The marvel is that the rebel was a prophet! "What he desired was not unjust in itself, that the Ninevites should be punished for their past sins, and that the sentence of God pronounced against them should not be recalled, although they repented. For so the judge hangs the robber for theft, however he repent." He sinned, in that he disputed with God. Let him cast the first stone, who never rejoiced at any overthrow of the enemies of his country, nor was glad, in a common warfare, that they lost as many soldiers as we. As if God had not instruments enough at His Will! Or as if He needed the Assyrians to punish Israel, or the one nation, whose armies are the terror of Europe, to punish us, so that if they should perish, Israel should therefore have escaped, though it persevered in sin, or we!

And he was very angry, or, it may be, very grieved. The word expresses also the emotion of burning grief, as when Samuel was grieved at the rejection of Saul, or David at the breach upon Uzzah<sup>10</sup>. Either way, he was displeased with what God did. Yet so Samuel and David took God's doings to heart; but Samuel and David were grieved at God's judgments; Jonah, at what to the Ninevites was mercy, only in regard to his own people it seemed to involve judgment. Scripture says that he was displeased, because the Ninevites were spared; but not, why this displeased him. It has been thought, that it was jealousy for God's glory among the heathen, as though the Ninevites would think that God in Whose Name he spake had no certain knowledge of things to come; and so that his fault was mistrust in God's Wisdom or Power to vindicate His own honour. But it seems more likely, that it was a mistaken patriotism, which idolized the well-being of his own and God's people, and desired that its enemy, the appointed instrument of its chastisement, should be itself destroyed. Scripture being silent about it, we cannot know certainly. Jonah, under God's inspiration, relates that God pronounced him wrong. Having incurred God's reproof, he was careless about men's judgement, and left his own character open to the harsh judgements of men; teaching us a holy indifference to man's opinion, and, in our ignorance, carefulness not to judge unkindly.

2. And he prayed unto the Lord. Jonah, at least, did not murmur or complain of God. He complained to God of Himself. He expostulates with Him. Shortsighted indeed and too wedded to his own will! Yet his will was the well-being of the people whose Prophet God had made him. He tells God, that this it was, which he had all along dreaded. He softens it, as well as he can, by his word, I pray Thee, which expresses deprecation and submissiveness. Still he does not hesitate to tell God that this was the cause of his first rebellion. Perilous to the soul, to speak without penitence of former sin; yet it is to God that he speaks, and so God, in His wonderful condescension, makes him teach himself.

I knew that Thou art a gracious God. He repeats to God to the letter His own words by Joel.<sup>1</sup> God had so revealed Himself anew to Judah. He had, doubtless, on some repentance which Judah had shewn, turned away the evil from them. And now by sending him as a preacher of repentance, He implied that He would do the same to the enemies of his country. God confirms this by the whole sequel. Thenceforth then Israel knew, that to the heathen also God was intensely, infinitely full of gracious and yearning love<sup>2</sup>, nay (as the form rather implies<sup>3</sup>) mastered (so to speak) by the might and intensity of His gracious love, slow to anger and delaying it, great in loving-tenderness, and abounding in it; and that towards them also, when the evil is about to be inflicted, or has been partially or wholly inflicted, He will repent of it and replace it with good, on the first turning of the soul or the nation to God.

3. Therefore now, O Lord, take I beseech Thee my life from me. He had rather die, than see the evil which was to come upon his country. Impatient though he was, he still cast himself upon God. By asking of God to end his life, he, at least, committed himself to the sovereign disposal of God. "4 Seeing that the Gentiles are, in a manner, entering in, and that those words are being fulfilled, <sup>5</sup>They have moved Me to jealousy with that which is not God, and I will move them to jealousy with those which are not a people, I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation, he despairs of the salvation of Israel, and is convulsed with great sorrow, which bursts out into

3 Therefore now, O LORD, take, I beseech thee, my life from me; for <sup>d</sup>it is better for me to die than to live.

4 ¶ Then said the Lord, || Doest thou well to be angry?

5 So Jonah went out of the city, and sat on the east side of the city, and there made words and sets forth the causes of grief, saying in a manner, 'Am I alone chosen out of so many prophets, to announce destruction to my people through the salvation of others?' He grieved not, as some think, that the multitude of nations is saved, but that Israel perishes. Whence our Lord also wept over Jerusalem. The Apostles first preached to Israel. Paul wishes to become an anathema for his <sup>6</sup>brethren who are Israelites, whose is the adoption and the glory and the covenant, and the giving of the law and the service of God, and the promises, whose are the fathers, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came." Jonah had discharged his office faithfully now. He had done what God commanded; God had done by him what He willed. Now, then, he prayed to be discharged. So S. Augustine in his last illness prayed that he might die, before the Vandals brought suffering and devastation on his country<sup>7</sup>.

4. And the Lord said, Doest thou well<sup>8</sup> to be angry? God, being appealed to, answers the appeal. So does He often in prayer, by some secret voice, answer the enquirer. There is right anger against the sin. Moses' anger was right, when he broke the tables<sup>9</sup>. God secretly suggests to Jonah that his anger was not right, as our Lord instructed<sup>10</sup> S. James and S. John that theirs was not. The question relates to the quality, not to the greatness of his anger. It was not the vehemence of his passionate desire for Israel, which God reproves, but that it was turned against the Ninevites. "11 What the Lord says to Jonah, he says to all, who in their office of the cure of souls are angry. They must, as to this same anger, be recalled in to themselves, to regard the cause or object of their anger, and weigh warily and attentively whether they do well to be angry. For if they are angry, not with men but with the sins of men, if they hate and persecute, not men, but the vices of men, they are rightly angry, their zeal is good. But if they are angry, not with sins but with men, if they hate, not vices but men, they are angered amiss, their zeal is bad. This then which was said to one, is to be watchfully looked to and decided by all, Doest thou well to be angry?"

5. So Jonah went out of the city<sup>12</sup>. The form of the words implies (as in the Eng. V.), that this took place after Jonah was convinced that God would spare Nineveh; and since there is no intimation that he knew it by revelation, then it was probably after the 40 days. "13 The days being now past, after which it was time that the things foretold should be accomplished, and His anger as yet taking no effect, Jonah understood that God had pity on Nineveh. Still he does not give up all hope, and thinks that a respite of the evil has been granted them on their willingness to repent, but that some effect of His displeasure would come, since the pains of their repentance had not equalled their offences. So thinking in himself apparently, he departs from the city, and waits to see what will become fectly (see bel. Mic. vii. 3), but it is nowhere used, of a passion or quality existing (passively) in a strong degree. The E. V. then is right. The E. M. art thou greatly angry? (the rendering of the LXX) is against the language. <sup>9</sup> Ex. xxxii. 19. <sup>10</sup> S. of them." "He expected" apparently "that it would either fall by an earthquake, or be burned with fire, like Sodom." "Jonah, in that he built him a tabernacle and sat over against Nineveh, awaiting what should happen to it, wore a different, foreshadowing character. For he prefigured the carnal people of Israel. For these too were sad at the salvation of the Ninevites, i. e. the redemption and deliverance of the Gentiles. Whence Christ came to call, not the righteous but sinners to repentance. But the overshadowing gourd over his head was the promises of the Old Testament or those offices in which, as the Apostle says, there was a shadow of good things to come, protecting them in the land of promise from temporal evils;—all which are now emptied and faded. And now that people, having lost the temple at Jerusalem and the priesthood and sacrifice (all which was a shadow of that which was to come) in its captive dispersion, is scorched by a vehement heat of tribulation, as Jonah by the heat of the sun, and grieves greatly; and yet the salvation of the heathen and the penitent is accounted of more moment than its grief, and the shadow which it loved."

6. And the Lord God prepared a gourd, [a palm-christ, E. M. rightly.] "God again commanded the gourd, as he did the whale, willing only that this should be. Forthwith it springs up beautiful and full of flower, and straightway was a roof to the whole booth, and anoints him so to speak with joy, with its deep shade. The Prophet rejoices at it exceedingly, as being a great and thankworthy thing. See now herein too the simplicity of his mind. For he was grieved exceedingly, because what he had prophesied came not to pass; he rejoiced exceedingly for a plant. A blameless mind is lightly moved to gladness or sorrow. You will see this in children.—For as people who are not strong, easily fall, if some one gives them no very strong push, but touches them as it were with a lighter hand, so too the guileless mind is easily carried away by anything which delights or grieves it." Little as the shelter of the palm-christ was in itself, Jonah must have looked upon its sudden growth, as a fruit of God's goodness towards him, (as it was) and then perhaps went on to think (as people do) that this favor of God shewed that He meant, in the end, to grant him what his heart was set upon. Those of impulsive temperaments are ever interpreting the acts of God's Providence, as bearing on what they strongly desire. Or again they argue, 'God throws this or that in our way; therefore He means us not to relinquish it for His sake, but to have it.' By this sudden miraculous shelter against the burning Assyrian sun, which God provided for Jonah, He favoured his waiting on there. So Jonah may have thought, interpreting rightly that God willed him to stay; wrongly, why He so willed. Jonah was to wait, not to see what he desired, but to receive, and be the channel of the instruction which God meant to convey to him and through him.

7. When the morning rose, i. e. in the earliest dawn, before the actual sunrise. For one day Jonah enjoyed the refreshment of the palm-christ. In early dawn, it still promised the shadow; just ere it was most needed, at God's command, it withered.

8. God prepared a vehement<sup>8</sup> [E. M. following the Chaldee, silent, i. e. sultry] East wind. The winds in the East, blowing over the sand-deserts, intensely increase the distress of the heat. A sojourner describes on two occasions an Assyrian summer. "The change to summer had been as rapid as that which ushered in the spring. The verdure of the plain had perished almost in a day. Hot winds, coming from the desert, had burnt up and carried away the shrubs.—The heat was now almost intolerable. Violent whirlwinds occasionally swept over the face of the country." "The spring was now fast passing away; the heat became daily greater; the corn was cut; and the plains and hills put on their summer-clothing of dull parched yellow. The pasture is withered, the herbage faileth; the green grass is not. It was the season too of the Sherghis, or burning winds from the South, which occasionally swept over the face of the country, driving in their short-lived fury everything before them.—We all went below [ground] soon after the sun had risen, and remained there [in the tunnels] without again seeking the open air until it was far down in the Western horizon." The "Sherghi" must be rather the East-wind, Sherki, whence Sirocco. At Sulimania in Koor-distan (about 2½ degrees E. of Nineveh, and ¾ of a degree South) "the so much dreaded Sherki seems to blow from any quarter, from E. to N.E.—It is greatly feared for its violence and relaxing qualities," "hot, stormy and singularly relaxing and dispiriting." Suffocating heat is a characteristic of these vehement winds. Morier relates at Bushire; "A gale of wind blew from the Southward and Eastward with such violence, never blowing ever since with great violence from the E. and N. E. the wind being heated like our Bagdad Saum, but I think softer and more relaxing. This wind is the terror of these parts." Ib. 105. "The extraordinary prevalence of the Sherki or Easterly wind this year, renders this season intolerably hot and relaxing. They had not had 3 days together free from this wind since the beginning of the summer." Ib. 271. "In the summer the climate is pleasant, except when the Easterly wind blows, which it does with prodigious violence sometimes for 8 or 10 days successively. The wind is hot and relaxing in summer, and what is very curious, it is not felt at the distance of 2 or 3 hours." Ib. 113. "This is asserted by every one in the country." Ib. 125.

8 2nd journey, p. 43. He continues, "Again from the 23rd to the 25th, the wind blew violently from the S. E. accompanied by a most suffocating heat, and continued to blow with the same strength until the next day at noon, when it suddenly veered round to the N. W. with a violence equal to what it had blown from the opposite point." And again (p. 97) "When there was a perfect calm, partial and strong currents of air would arise and form whirlwinds, which produced high columns of sand all over the plain. They are looked upon as the sign of great heat. Their strength was very various. Frequently ment east wind; and the sun beat upon the head of Jonah, that he fainted, and wished in himself to die, and said, "It is better for me to die than to live."

that three of our largest tents were leveled with the ground. The wind brought with it such hot currents of air, that we thought it might be the precursor of the Samoom described by Chardin, but upon enquiry, we found that the autumn was generally the season for that wind. The Sam wind commits great ravages in this district. It blows at night from about midnight to sunrise, comes in a hot blast, and is afterwards succeeded by a cold one. About 6 years ago, there was a sam during the summer months which so totally burnt up all the corn, then near its maturity, that no animal would eat a blade of it, nor touch any of its grain."

The sun beat upon the head of Jonah. "Few European travellers can brave the perpendicular rays of an Assyrian sun. Even the well-seasoned Arab seeks the shade during the day, and journeys by night, unless driven forth at noon-tide by necessity, or the love of war."

He wished in himself to die. [lit. he asked as to his soul, to die]. He prayed for death. It was still the same dependence upon God, even in his self-will. He did not murmur, but prayed God to end his life here. When men are already vexed in soul by deep inward griefs, a little thing often oversets patience. Jonah's hopes had been revived by the mercy of the palmchrist; they perished with it. Perhaps he had before him the thought of his great predecessor, Elijah, how he too wished to die, when it seemed that his mission was fruitless. They differed in love. Elijah's preaching, miracles, toil, sufferings, seemed to him, not only to be in vain, but (as they must, if in vain), to add to the guilt of his people. God corrected him too, by showing him his own short-sightedness, that he knew not of the seven thousand who had not bowed their knees unto Baal, who were, in part, doubtless, the travail of his soul. Jonah's mission to his people seemed also to be fruitless; his hopes for their well-being were at an end; the temporal mercies of which he had been the Prophet, were exhausted; Nineveh was spared; his last hope was gone; the future scourge of his people was maintained in might. The soul shrinks into itself at the sight of the impending visitation of its country. But Elijah's zeal was for his people only and the glory of God in it, and so it was pure love. Jonah's was directed against the Ninevites, and so had to be purified.

9. Doest thou well to be angry? "See again how Almighty God, out of His boundless loving-kindness, with the yearning tenderness of a father, almost disporteth with the guileless souls of the saints! The palmchrist shades him: the Prophet rejoices in it exceedingly. Then, in God's Providence, the caterpillar attacks it, the burning East-wind smites it, shewing at the same time how very necessary the relief of its shade, that the Prophet might be the more grieved, when deprived of such a good.—He asketh him skilfully, was he very grieved? and that for a shrub? He confesseth, and this becometh the defence for God, the Lover of mankind."

I do well to be angry, unto death. "Vehement anger they threw down our tents." Burckhardt, when professedly lessening the general impression as to these winds, says, "The worst effect [of the Semoom "a violent S.E. wind"] is that it dries up the water in the skins, and so far endangers the traveller's safety.—In one morning ½ of the contents of a full water-skin was evaporated. I always observed the whole atmosphere appear as if in a state of combustion; the dust and sand are carried high into the air, which assumes a reddish or blueish or yellowish tint, according to the nature and colour of the ground, from which the dust arises. The Semoom is not always leadeth men to long and love to die, especially if thwarted and unable to remove the hindrance whichangers them. For then vehement anger begetteth vehement sorrow, grief, despondency." We have each, his own palmchrist; and our palmchrist has its own worm. "In Jonah, who mourned when he had discharged his office, we see those who, in what they seem to do for God, either do not seek the glory of God, but some end of their own, or at least, think that glory to lie where it does not. For he who seeketh the glory of God, and not his own things, but those of Jesus Christ, ought to will what God hath willed and done. If he wills aught else, he declares plainly that he sought himself, not God, or himself more than God.—Jonah sought the glory of God wherein it was not, in the fulfilment of a prophecy of woe. And choosing to be led by his own judgment, not by God's, whereas he ought to have joyed exceedingly, that so many thousands, being dead, were alive again, being lost, were found, he, when there was joy in heaven among the angels of God over so many repenting sinners, was afflicted with a great affliction and was angry. This ever befalls those who wish that to take place, not what is best and most pleasing to God, but what they think most useful to themselves. Whence we see our very great and common error, who think our peace and tranquillity to lie in the fulfilment of our own will, whereas this will and judgment of our own is the cause of all our trouble. So then Jonah prays and tacitly blames God, and would not so much excuse as approve that, his former flight, to Him Whose eyes are too pure to behold iniquity.—And since all inordinate affection is a punishment to itself, and he who departeth from the order of God hath no stability, he is in such anguish, because what he wills, will not be, that he longs to die. For it cannot but be that his life, who measures every thing by his own will and mind, and who followeth not God as his Guide but rather willesh to be the guide of the Divine Will, should be from time to time troubled with great sorrow. But since the merciful and gracious Lord hath pity on our infirmity and gently admonisheth us within, when He sees us at variance with Him, He forsakes not Jonah in that hot grief, but lovingly blames him.—How restless such men are, we see from Jonah. The palmchrist grows over his head, and he was exceeding glad of the palmchrist. Any labour or discomfort they bear very ill, and being accustomed to endure nothing and follow their own will, they are tormented and cannot bear it, as Jonah did not the sun. If any thing, however slight, happen to lighten their grief, they are immoderately glad. Soon gladdened, soon grieved, like children. They have not learned to bear any thing moderately. What marvel then that their joy is soon turned into sorrow? They are joyed over a palmchrist, which soon greeneth, soon drieth, quickly falls to the ground and is trampled upon.—Such are the things of this world, which, while possessed, seem great and lasting; when suddenly lost, men see how vain and passing they are, and that hope is to be placed, accompanied by whirlwinds: in its less violent degree it will blow for hours with little force, although with oppressive heat; when the whirlwind raises the dust, it then increases several degrees in heat. In the Semoom at Esne, the thermometer mounted to 121° in the shade, but the air seldom remains longer than a quarter of an hour in that state, or longer than the whirlwind lasts. The most disagreeable effect of the Semoom on man is, that it stops perspiration, dries up the palate, and produces great restlessness." 10 Then said the LORD, Thou hast || had pity on the gourd, for the which thou hast not laboured, neither madest it grow; which † came up in a night, and perished in a night:

not in them but in their Creator, Who is Unchangeable. It is then a great dispensation of God towards us, when those things in which we took especial pleasure are taken away. Nothing can man have so pleasing, green, and, in appearance, so lasting, which has not its own worm prepared by God, whereby, in the dawn, it may be smitten and die. The change of human will or envy disturbs court-favour; manifold accidents, wealth; the varying opinion of the people or of the great, honours; disease, danger, poverty, infamy, pleasure. Jonah's palmchrist had one worm; our's, many; if other were wanting, there is the restlessness of man's own thoughts, whose food is restlessness."

10. Thou hadst pity on the palmchrist. In the feeling of our common mortality, the soul cannot but yearn over decay. Even a drooping flower is sad to look on, so beautiful, so frail. It belongs to this passing world, where nothing lovely abides, all things beautiful hasten to cease to be. The natural God-implemented feeling is the germ of the spiritual.

11. Should I not spare? lit. have pity and so spare. God waives for the time the fact of the repentance of Nineveh, and speaks of those on whom man must have pity, those who never had any share in its guilt, the 120,000 children of Nineveh, "1 who, in the weakness of infancy, knew not which hand, the right or the left, is the stronger and fitter for every use." He Who would have spared Sodom for ten's sake, might well be thought to spare Nineveh for the 120,000's sake, in whom the inborn corruption had not developed into the malice of wilful sin. If these 120,000 were the children under three years old, they were 1/2 (as is calculated) of the whole population of Nineveh. If of the 600,000 of Nineveh all were guilty, who by reason of age could be, above 1/2 were innocent of actual sin.

To Jonah, whose eye was evil to Nineveh for his people's sake, God says, as it were, "1 Let the spirit which is willing say to the flesh which is weak, 'Thou grievest for the palmchrist, that is, thine own kindred, the Jewish people; and shall not I spare Nineveh that great city, shall not I provide for the salvation of the Gentiles in the whole world, who are in ignorance and error? For there are many thousands among the Gentiles, who go after 2 dumb idols even as they are led, not out of malice but out of ignorance, who would without doubt correct their ways, if they had the knowledge of the truth, if they were shewn the difference between their right hand and their left, i. e. between the truth of God and the lie of men.'"

But, beyond the immediate teaching to Jonah, God lays down a principle of His dealings at all times, that, in His visitations of nations, He, 3 the Father of the fatherless and judge of the widows, takes especial account of those who are of no account in man's sight, and defers the impending judgment, not for the sake of the wisdom of the wise or the courage of the brave, but for the helpless, weak, and, as yet, innocent as to actual sin. How much more may we think that He regards those with pity who have on them not only the recent uneffaced traces of their Maker's Hands, but have been reborn in the Image of Christ His Only-Begotten Son! The infants clothed with Christ 4 must be a special treasure of the Church in the Eyes of God.

"6 How much greater the mercy of God than that even of a holy man; how far better to flee to the judgment-seat of God than to the tribunal of man. Had Jonah been judge in the cause of the Ninevites, he would have passed on them all, although penitent, the sentence of death for their past guilt, because God had passed it before their repentance. So David said to God: 6 Let us fall now into the hand of the Lord; for His mercies are great; and let me not fall into the hand of man. Whence the Church professes to God, that mercy is the characteristic of His power; 7 O God, who shewest Thy Almighty power most chiefly in shewing mercy and pity, mercifully grant unto us such a measure of Thy grace, that we, running the way of Thy commandments, may obtain Thy gracious promises, and be made partakers of Thy heavenly treasure."

"Again, God here teaches Jonah and us all to conform ourselves in all things to the Divine Will, that, when He commandeth any work, we should forthwith begin and continue it with alacrity and courage; when He bids us cease from it, or deprives it of its fruit and effect, we should forthwith tranquilly cease, and patiently allow our work and toil to lack its end and fruit. For what is our aim, save to do the Will of God, and in all things to confirm ourselves to it? But now the Will of God is, that thou shouldst resign, yea destroy, the work thou hast begun. Acquiesce then in it. Else thou servest not the Will of God, but thine own fancy and cupidity. And herein consists the perfection of the holy soul, that, in all acts and events, adverse or prosperous, it should with full resignation resign itself most humbly and entirely to God, and acquiesce, happen what will, yea, and rejoice that the Will of God is fulfilled in this thing, and say with holy Job, The Lord gave, The Lord hath taken away; blessed be the Name of the Lord—S. Ignatius had so transferred his own will into the Will of God, that he said, 'If perchance the society, which I have begun and furthered with such toil, should be dissolved or perish, after passing half an hour in prayer, I should, by God's help, have no trouble from this thing, than which none sadder could befall me.' The saints let themselves be turned this way and that, round and round, by the Will of God, as a horse by its rider."

MICAH.

Micah, or Micaiah, the Morasthite, was so called, probably, in order to distinguish him from his great predecessor, Micaiah, son of Imlah, in the reign of Ahab. His name was spoken in its fuller form, by the elders of the land whose words Jeremiah has preserved. And in that fuller form his name is known, where the Greek and Latin translations of the Scriptures are used<sup>a</sup>. By the Syrians, and by the Jews<sup>b</sup> he is still called, as by us, Micah. The fullest and original form is Micaiahu, "who is like the Lord?" In this fullest form, it is the name of one of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people<sup>c</sup>, as also of the mother of king Asa<sup>d</sup>, (the same name serving sometimes both for men and women). Then according to the habit of abridging names, in all countries, and especially those of which the proper name of the Lord is a part, it is diversely abridged into Micaihu, Micahu<sup>e</sup>, whence Micah is readily formed, on the same rule as Micaiah itself from Micaiahu. The forms are all found indifferently. The idolatrous Levite in the time of the Judges<sup>f</sup>, and the son of Imlah<sup>g</sup>, are both called in the same chapter Micaihu and Micah; the father of one of Josiah's officers is called Micaiah in the book of Kings<sup>h</sup>, Micah in the Chronicles<sup>i</sup>.

The Prophet's name, like those of Joshua, Elijah, Elisha, Hosea, Joel, Obadiah, was significant. Joshua's, we know, was changed of set purpose<sup>k</sup>. The rest seem to have been given in God's Providence, or taken by the Prophets, in order to enunciate truths concerning God, opposed to the idolatries or self-dependance of the people. But the name of Micah or Micaiah, (as the elders of the land<sup>l</sup> called him on a solemn occasion, some 120 years afterwards) contained more than teaching. It was cast into the form of a challenge. Who is like the Lord? The form of words had been impressed on Israel by the song of Moses after the deliverance at the Red sea<sup>m</sup>. In the days of Elijah and that first Micaiah, the strife between God and man, the true Prophet and the false, had been ended at the battle of Ramoth-Gilead; it ceased for a time, in the reigns of Jehu and his successors, because in consequence of his partial obedience, God, by Elisha and Jonah, promised them good: it was again resumed, as the promise to Jehu was expiring, and God's prophets had anew to proclaim a message of woe. Hast thou found me, O mine enemy<sup>n</sup>? and, I hate him, for he doth not prophesy good concerning me, but evil, Ahab's words as to Elijah and Micaiah, were the types of the subsequent contradiction of the false prophets to Hosea and Amos, which closed only with the destruction of Samaria. Now, in the time of the later Micaiah, were the first dawns of the same strife in Judah, which hastened and brought about the destruction of Jerusalem under Zedekiah, which re-appeared after the Captivity<sup>p</sup>, and was the immediate cause of the second destruction under the Romans<sup>q</sup>. Micah, as he dwells on the meaning of names generally, so, doubtless, it is in allusion to his own, that, at the close of his prophecy, he ushers in his announcement of God's incomparable mercy with the words<sup>r</sup>, Who is a God like unto Thee? Before him, whatever disobedience there was to God's law in Judah, there was no systematic, organised, opposition to His prophets. There is no token of it in Joel. From the times of Micah it is never missing. We find it in each prophet (however brief the remains of some are), who prophesied directly to Judah, not in Isaiah only, but in Habakkuk<sup>s</sup> and Zephaniah<sup>t</sup>. It deepened, as it hastened towards its decision. The nearer God's judgments were at hand, the more obstinately the false prophets denied that they would come. The system of false prophecy, which rose to its height in the time of Jeremiah, which met and thwarted him at every step<sup>u</sup>, and deceived those who wished to be deceived, was dawning in the time of Micah. False prophecy arose in Judah from the self-same cause whence it had arisen in Israel, because Judah's deepening corruption drew down the prophecies of God's displeasure, which it was popular to disbelieve. False prophecy was a gainful occupation. The false prophets had men's wishes on their side. They had the people with them. My people love to have it so<sup>x</sup>, said God. They forbade Micah to prophesy<sup>y</sup>; prophesied peace<sup>z</sup>, when God foretold evil; prophesied for gain<sup>aa</sup>, and proclaimed war in the Name of God<sup>ab</sup> against those who fed them not.

At such a time was Micah called. His name which he himself explains, was no chance name. To the Hebrews, to whom names were so much more significant, parts of the living lan-

Josephus calls both prophets Micaías, Micah son of Imlah, Ant. 8. 14. 5. and our prophet, Ant. 10. 6. 2. The Vulgate uses for both, Michæas. <sup>b</sup> They substituted מִיכָה in the Kri in Jeremiah. <sup>c</sup> 2 Chr. xvii. 7. <sup>d</sup> Ib. xliii. 2. <sup>e</sup> Ib. xviii. 8. Keth. guage, it recalled the name of his great predecessor, his standing alone against all the prophets of Ahab, his prophecy, his suffering, his evidenced truth. The truth of prophecy was set upon the issue of the battle before Ramoth-Gilead. In the presence of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, as well as of Ahab, the 400 prophets of Ashtaroth had promised to Ahab the prize he longed for. One solitary, discriminating voice was heard amid that clamorous multitude, forewarning Ahab that he would perish, his people would be scattered. On the one side, was that loud triumphant chorus of all the prophets, Go up to Ramoth-Gilead, and prosper; for the Lord shall deliver it into the king's hand. On the other, one solemn voice, exhibiting before them that sad spectacle which the morrow's sun should witness<sup>d</sup>, I saw all Israel scattered upon the hills, as sheep that have not a shepherd, and the Lord said, these have no master, let them return every man to his house in peace. Micah was smitten, imprisoned, and, apparently, ended his ministry, appealing from that small audience of the armies of Israel and Judah to the whole world, which has ever since looked back on that strife with interest and awe; Hear ye peoples, each one of them. God, who guided the archer shooting at a venture<sup>f</sup>, fulfilled the words which He had put into the Prophet's mouth. God's word had found Ahab, although disguised; Jehoshaphat, the emperilled<sup>g</sup>, returned home, to relate the issue. The conflict between God's truth and idol falsehood was doubtless long remembered in Judah. And now when the strife had penetrated into Judah, to be ended some 170<sup>h</sup> years afterwards in the destruction of Jerusalem, another Micah arose, his name the old watchword, Who is like the Lord? He prefixed to his prophecy that same summons<sup>i</sup> to the whole world to behold the issue of the conflict, which God had once accredited and, in that issue, had given an earnest of the victory of His truth, there thenceforth and for ever.

The prophet was born a villager, in Moresheth Gath, "a village"<sup>j</sup>, S. Jerome says; ("a little village"<sup>k</sup>), in S. Jerome's own days), "East of Eleutheropolis," where what was "formerly his grave," was "now a church." Since it was his birth-place and his burial-place, it was probably his home also. In the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, the elders of the land<sup>m</sup> speak of him with this same title, the Morasthite. He lingers, in his prophecy, among the towns of the maritime plain (the Shephelah) where his birthplace lay. Among the ten places in that neighbourhood<sup>n</sup>, which he selects for warning and for example of the universal captivity, is his native village, "the home he loved." But the chief scene of his ministry was Jerusalem. He names it in the beginning of his prophecy, as the place where the idolatries, and, with the idolatries, all the other sins of Judah were concentrated. The two capitals, Samaria and Jerusalem, were the chief objects of the word of God to him, because the corruption of each kingdom streamed forth from them. The sins which he rebukes are chiefly those of the capital. Extreme oppression<sup>o</sup>, violence among the rich<sup>p</sup>, bribing among judges, priests, prophets<sup>q</sup>; building up the capital even by cost of life, or actual bloodshed<sup>r</sup>; spoliation<sup>s</sup>; expulsion of the powerless, women and children from their homes<sup>t</sup>; covetousness<sup>u</sup>; cheating in dealings<sup>v</sup>; pride<sup>w</sup>. These, of course, may be manifoldly repeated in lesser places of resort and of judgment. But it is Zion and Jerusalem which are so built up with blood<sup>x</sup>; Zion and Jerusalem, which are, on that ground, to be plowed as a field<sup>y</sup>; it is the city, to which the Lord's voice crieth<sup>z</sup>; whose rich men are full of violence<sup>aa</sup>; it is the daughter of Zion<sup>b</sup>, which is to go forth out of the city and go to Babylon. Especially, they are the heads and princes of the people<sup>c</sup>, whom he upbraids for perversion of justice and for oppression. Even the good kings of Judah seem to have been powerless to restrain the general corruption.

Micah, according to the title which he prefixed to his prophecy, was called to the prophetic office somewhat later than Isaiah. His ministry began later, and ended earlier. For Uzziah, in whose reign Isaiah began to prophesy, was dead before Micah was called to his office; and Micah probably was called away early in the reign of Hezekiah, whereas some of the chief public acts of Isaiah's ministry fell in the 17th and 18th years of the reign of Hezekiah. Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, had doubtless been withdrawn to their rest. Hosea alone, in "grey-haired might," was still protesting in vain against the deepening corruptions of Israel.

The contents of Micah's prophecy and his relation to Isaiah agree with the inscription. His prophecy has indications of the times of Jotham, perhaps also of those of Ahaz; one signal prophecy, we know historically, was uttered in the reign of Hezekiah.

It is now owned, well nigh on all hands, that the great prophecy, three verses of which Isaiah prefixed to his 2nd chapter, was originally delivered by Micah. But it appears from the context in Isaiah, that he delivered the prophecy in that 2nd chapter, in the reign of Jotham. Other language of Micah also belongs to that same reign. No one now thinks that Micah adopted that great prophecy from Isaiah. The prophecy, as it stands in Micah, is in close connection with what precedes it. He had said<sup>d</sup>, the mountain of the house shall be as the high places of the forest; he subjoins instantly God's reversal of that sentence, in the latter days. And in the last days it shall be that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established on the top of the mountains, and peoples shall flow unto it. He had said, Zion shall be plowed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps; he adds forthwith, in reversal of this<sup>e</sup>, the law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. The two sentences are joined as closely as they can be; Zion shall be plowed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house shall become high places of a forest; and it shall be, in the last days, the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be (abidingly<sup>g</sup>) established on the top of the mountains. Every reader would understand, that the elevation intended, was spiritual, not physical. They could not fail to understand the metaphor; or imagine that the Mount Zion, on part of which, (Mount Moriah,) the house of the Lord stood, should be physically placed on other hills. But the contrast is marked. The promise is the sequel of the woe; the abiding condition is the reversal of the sentence of its desolation. Even the words allude, the one to the other<sup>h</sup>.

In Isaiah, there is no such connection. After the first chapter and its summary of rebuke, warning, threatening, and final weal or woe resting on each class, Isaiah, in his second chapter, begins his prophecy anew with a fresh title<sup>i</sup>; The word that Isaiah the son of Amos saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem; and to this he prefixes three verses from Micah's prophecy. He separates it in a marked way from the preceding summary, and yet connects it with some other prophecy by the word, And<sup>j</sup>. He himself marks that it is not in its original place here. So then, in the prophet Micah, the close connection with the foregoing marks that it is in its original place ; Isaiah marked purposely that in his prophecy it is not.

But Isaiah's prophecy belongs to a time of prosperity ; such as Judah had not, after the reign of Jotham. It was a time of great warlike strength, diffused through the whole land. The land was full <sup>1</sup>, without end, of gold, silver, chariots, horses, of lofty looks and haughtiness. The images which follow <sup>1</sup> are shadows of the Day of Judgment, and extend beyond Judah ; but the sins rebuked are the sins of strength and might, self-confidence, oppression, manifold female luxury and bravery <sup>2</sup>. Isaiah prophesies that God would take away their strength <sup>2</sup>. Then they still had it. Judah trusted not at that time in God nor in foreign alliances, but in self. Yet, from the time of Ahaz, trust in foreign help infected them to the end. Even Hezekiah, when he received the messengers of Merodach-baladan <sup>3</sup>, fell into the snare ; and Josiah probably lost his life, as a vassal of Assyria <sup>4</sup>. This union of inherent strength and unconcernedness about foreign aid is an adequate test of days anterior to Ahaz.

But since Isaiah prefixed to a prophecy in the days of Jotham this great prophecy of Micah, then Micah's prophecy must have been already current. To those same days of strength it belongs, that Micah could prophesy as a gift, the cutting off <sup>5</sup> of horses and chariots, the destruction of cities and strong towers, all, in which Judah trusted instead of God. The prophecy is a counterpart of Isaiah's. Isaiah prophesied a day of Judgment, in which all these things should be removed ; Micah foretold that their removal should be a mercy to those who trust in Christ.

On the other hand, the utter dislocation of society, the bursting of all the most sacred bands which bind man to man together, described in his last chapter <sup>6</sup>, perhaps belong most to the miserable decay in the reign of Ahaz. The idolatry spoken of also belongs probably to the time of Ahaz. In Jotham's time <sup>7</sup>, the people sacrificed and burned incense still in the high places ; yet, under a king so highly praised <sup>8</sup>, these are not likely to have been in Jerusalem. But Micah, in the very head of his prophecy, speaks of Jerusalem <sup>9</sup> as the centre of the idolatries of Judah. The allusion also to child-sacrifices belongs to the time of Ahaz, who sacrificed sons of his own <sup>10</sup>, and whose sacrifice others probably imitated. The mention of the special idolatry of the time, <sup>11</sup> the statutes of Omri are kept, and all the works of the house of Ahab, belong to the same reign, it being recorded of Ahaz especially <sup>12</sup>, he walked in the ways of the kings of Israel and made also molten images for Baalim ; the special sin of the house of Ahab. That character too which he describes, that, amid all that idolatry, practical irreligion, and wickedness, they leant upon the Lord, and said, Is not the Lord among us ? none evil can come upon us <sup>13</sup> ; was just the character of Ahaz. Not until the end of his reign was he so embittered by God's chastisements, that he closed His temple <sup>14</sup>. Up to that time, even after he had copied the brazen altar at Damascus, he still kept up a divided allegiance to God. Urijah, the high Priest, at the king's command, offered the sacrifices for the king and the people, while Ahaz used the brazen altar, to enquire by <sup>15</sup>. This was just the half-service which God by Micah rejects. It is the old history of man's half-service, faith without love, which provides, that what it believes but loves not, should be done for it, and itself enacts what it prefers. Urijah was to offer the lawful sacrifices for the king and the people ; Ahaz was to obtain knowledge of the future, such as he wished in his own way, a lying future, by lying acts.

Micah renewed under Hezekiah the prophecy of the utter destruction of Jerusalem, which he had pronounced under Jotham. The prophets did not heed repeating themselves. Eloquent as they were, they are the more eloquent because eloquence was not their object. Even our Lord, with Divine wisdom, and the more, probably, because He had Divine wisdom, repeated in His teaching the same words. Those words sank the deeper, because often repeated. So Micah repeated doubtless oftentimes those words, which he first uttered in the days of Jotham ; Zion shall be plowed like a field and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest. Often, during those perhaps thirty years, he repeated them in vain. At the last, they wrought a great repentance, and delayed, it may be for 136 years, the destruction which he was constrained to foretell. Early in the days of Jehoiakim, about 120 years afterwards, in the public assembly when Jeremiah was on trial for his life, the elders of the land said explicitly, that the great conversion at the beginning of the reign of Hezekiah, nay, of that king himself, was wrought by the teaching of Micah. <sup>16</sup> Then rose up, says Jeremiah, certain of the elders of the land, and spake to all the assembly of the people, saying, Micah the Morasthite prophesied in the days of Hezekiah king of Judah, saying, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, Zion shall be ploughed like a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house, as the high places of the forest. Did Hezekiah king of Judah, and all Judah, put him at all to death ? Did he not fear the Lord, and besought the Lord, and the Lord repented Him of the evil which He had pronounced against them ?

It may have been that single prophecy which Micah so delivered ; some have thought that it was his whole book. Jeremiah, at God's command, at one time uttered single prophecies ; at another, the summary of all his prophecies. This only is certain, that the prophecy, whether these words alone or the book containing them, was delivered to all Judah, and that God moved the people through them to repentance.

The words, as they occur in Jeremiah, are the same, and in the same order, as they stand in Micah. Only in Jeremiah the common plural termination is substituted for the rarer and poetic form used by Micah <sup>17</sup>. The elders, then, who quoted them, probably knew them, not from tradition, but from the written book of the Prophet. But those elders speak of Micah, as exercising his prophetic office in the days of Hezekiah. They do not say, he prophesied, which might have been a single act ; but he was prophesying, hayah nibbah, a form of speaking which is only used of an abiding, habitual, action. They say also, "he was habitually prophesying, and he said," i. e. as we should say, "in the course of his prophesying in the days of Hezekiah, he said." Still it was to all the people of Judah that he said it. The elders say so, and lay stress upon it by repeating it. Did Hezekiah king of Judah and all Judah put him at all to death ? It must have been then on some of the great festivals, when all Judah was gathered together, that Micah so spake to them.

Probably, shortly afterwards, in those first years of Hezekiah, Micah's office on earth closed. For, at the outset and in the summary of his prophecy, not incidentally, he speaks of the destruction of Samaria, which took place in the 4th year of Hezekiah, as still to come ; and however practical or partial idolatry continued, such idolatry as he throughout describes, did not exist after the reformation by Hezekiah. This conversion, then, of the king and of some considerable part of Judah was probably the closing harvest of his life, after a long seed-time of tears. So God allowed His servant to depart in peace. The reformation itself, at least in its fulness, took place after the kingdom of Samaria had come to an end, since Hezekiah's messengers could, unhindered, invite all Israel to join in his great Passover. Probably, then, Micah lived to see the first dawns only of the first reformation which God wrought by his words.

At the commencement, then, of Hezekiah's reign he collected the substance of what God had taught by him, re-casting it, so to speak, and retaining of his spoken prophecy so much as God willed to remain for us. As it stands, it belongs to that early time of Hezekiah's reign, in which the sins of Ahaz still lived on. Corruption of manners had been hereditary. In Jotham's reign too, it is said expressly, in contrast with himself, the people were still doing corruptly. Idolatry had, under Ahaz, received a fanatic impulse from the king, who, at last, set himself to close the worship of God<sup>1</sup>. The strength of Jotham's reign was gone; the longing for its restoration led to the wrong and destructive policy, against which Isaiah had to contend. Of this Micah says, such should not be the strength of the future kingdom of God. Idolatry and oppression lived on; against these, the inheritance of those former reigns, the sole residuum of Jotham's might or Ahaz' policy, the breach of the law of love of God and man, Micah concentrated his written prophecy.

This book also has remarkable symmetry. Each of its three divisions is a whole, beginning with upbraiding for sin, threatening God's judgments, and ending with promises of future mercy in Christ. The two later divisions begin again with that same characteristic, Hear ye<sup>h</sup>, with which Micah had opened the whole. The three divisions are also connected, as well by lesser references of the later to the former, as also by the advance of the prophecy. Judah could not be trusted now with any simple declaration of God's future mercy. They supposed themselves, impenitent as they were and with no purpose of repentance, to be the objects of God's care, and secure from evil. Unmixed promise of good would but foment this irreligious apathy. Hence on the promises at the end of the first portion<sup>i</sup>, and their king shall pass before them and the Lord at the head of them, he turns abruptly<sup>k</sup>, And I said, Hear, I pray you, Is it not for you to know judgment? The promise had been to Jacob and the remnant of Israel<sup>l</sup>. He renews his summons to the <sup>k</sup> heads of Jacob and the princes of the house of Israel. In like way, the last section, opening with that wonderful pleading of God with His people, follows upon that unbroken declaration of God's mercies, which itself issues out of the promised Birth at Bethlehem.

There is also a sort of progress in the promises of the three parts<sup>1</sup>. In the first, it is of deliverance generally, in language taken from that first deliverance from Egypt. The 2nd is objective, the Birth of the Redeemer, the conversion of the Gentiles, the restoration of the Jews, the establishment and nature of His kingdom. The third is mainly subjective, man's repentance, waiting upon God, and God's forgiveness of his sins.

Throughout, the metropolis is chiefly addressed, as the main seat of present evil<sup>m</sup> and as the centre of the future blessings; where the reign of the long-promised Ruler should be<sup>n</sup>; whence the revelation of God should go forth to the heathen<sup>o</sup>; whither the scattered and dispersed people should be gathered<sup>p</sup>.

Throughout the prophecy also, Micah upbraids the same class of sins, wrong dealing of man to man, oppression of the poor by the rich<sup>q</sup>. Throughout, their future captivity and deliverance are either predicted<sup>r</sup>, or assumed as the basis of the prediction of good<sup>s</sup>. Throughout, we see the contemporary of the prophet Isaiah. Besides that great prediction, which Isaiah inserted verbally from Micah, we see them, as it were, side by side, in that city of God's visitation and of His mercy, prophesying the same respite, the same place of captivity and deliverance from it, the same ulterior mercies in Christ. "The more to establish the faith, God willed that Isaiah and Micah should speak together, as with one mouth, and use such agreement as might the more convict all rebels." Assyria was then the monarchy of the world; yet both prophets promise deliverance from it<sup>t</sup>; both foretell the captivity in the then subordinate Babylon<sup>u</sup>; both, the deliverance from it<sup>v</sup>. Both speak in the like way of the gathering together of God's people from lands<sup>w</sup>, to some of which they were not yet dispersed. Isaiah prophesied the Virgin-Birth of Immanuel<sup>x</sup>; Micah, the Birth at Bethlehem of Him Whose goings forth have been of old, from everlasting<sup>y</sup>. Both speak in the like way of the reverence for the Gentiles thereafter for her<sup>z</sup>, by reason of the presence of her God. Even, in outward manner, Micah, representing himself, as one who went mourning and wailing, stripped and naked<sup>a</sup>, is a sort of forerunner of the symbolic acts of Isaiah<sup>d</sup>. Micah had this also common with Isaiah, that he has a predominance of comfort. He is brief in upbraiding<sup>e</sup>, indignant in casting back the pleas of the false prophets<sup>f</sup>, concise in his threatenings of woe<sup>g</sup>, save where he lingers mournfully over the desolation<sup>h</sup>, large and flowing in his descriptions of mercy to come<sup>i</sup>. He sees and pronounces the coming punishment, as absolutely certain; he does not call to repentance to avert it; he knows that ultimately it will not be averted; he sees it irrespectively of time, and says that it will be. Time is an accident to the link of cause and effect. Sin consummated would be the cause; punishment, the effect. He spoke to those who knew that God pardoned on repentance, who had lately had before them that marvellous instance in Nineveh. He dashes to the ground their false security, by reason of their descent from Jacob<sup>k</sup>, of God's Presence among them in the Temple<sup>l</sup>; the multitude of their offerings amid the multitude of their sins<sup>m</sup>. He rejects in God's name, their false, outward, impenitent, penitence; and thereby the more implies that He would accept a true repentance. They knew this, and were, for a time, scared into penitence. But in his book, as God willed it to remain, he is rather the prophet of God's dealings, than the direct preacher of repentance to individuals. Yet he is the more an evangelic preacher, in that he speaks of repentance, only as the gift of God. He does not ignore that man must accept the grace of God; but, as Isaiah foretells of the days of the Gospel, the idols He shall utterly abolish<sup>n</sup>, so Micah first foretells that God would abolish all wherein man relied out of God, all wherein he prided himself<sup>o</sup>, every form of idolatry<sup>p</sup>, and subsequently describes the future evangelic repentance, submission to, and waiting upon God, and His righteousness<sup>q</sup>; and God's free plenary forgiveness<sup>r</sup>.

Micah's rapid unprepared transitions from each of his main themes to another, from upbraiding to threatening, from threatening to mercy and then back again to upbraiding, is probably a part of that same vivid perception of the connection of sin, chastisement, forgiveness, in the will and mind of God. He sees them and speaks of them in the natural sequence in which they were exhibited to him. He connects most commonly the sin with the punishment by the one word, therefore<sup>a</sup>, because it was an object with him to shew the connection. The mercies to come he subjoins either suddenly without any conjunction<sup>t</sup>, or with the simple and. An English reader loses some of the force of this simplicity by the paraphrase, which, for the simple copula, substitutes the inference or contrast, therefore, then, but, notwithstanding<sup>u</sup>, which lie in the subjects themselves. An English reader might have been puzzled, at first sight, by the monotonous simplicity of the, and, and, joining together the mention of events, which stand, either as the contrast or the consequence of those which precede them. The English version accordingly has consulted for the reader or hearer, by drawing out for him the contrast or consequence which lay beneath the surface. But this gain of clearness involved giving up so far the majestic simplicity of the Prophet, who at times speaks of things as they lay in the Divine Mind, and as, one by one, they would be unfolded to man, without explaining the relation in which they stood to one another. Micah knew that sufferings were, in God's purpose, travail-pains. And so, immediately after the denunciation of punishment, he adds so calmly, "And in the last days it shall be;" "And thou, Bethlehem Ephratah." Or in the midst of his descriptions of mercies, he speaks of the intervening troubles, as the way to them. Now why dost thou cry aloud?—pangs have taken thee, as a woman in travail—he in pain—thou shalt go even unto Babylon; there shalt thou be delivered: or, Therefore will He give thee up until the time, &c. i. e. because He has these good things in store for thee, He will give thee up, until the time comes.

With this great simplicity Micah unites great vividness and energy. Thus in predicting punishment, he uses the form of command, bidding them, as it were, execute it on themselves<sup>a</sup>; Arise, depart: as, in the Great Day, our Lord shall say, Depart, ye cursed. And since God does in us or by us what He commands to be done, he uses the imperative to Zion, alike as to her victories over God's enemies<sup>b</sup>, or her state of anxious fear<sup>c</sup>.

To that same vividness belong his rapid changes of person or gender; his sudden questions<sup>d</sup>; his unmarked dialogues. The changes of person and gender occur in all Hebrew poetry;

all have their emphasis. He addresses the people or place as a whole (fem.), then all the individuals in her<sup>e</sup>; or turns away and speaks of it<sup>f</sup>; or, contrariwise, having spoken of the whole in the third person, he turns round and drives the warning home to individuals<sup>g</sup>. The variations in the last verse of ch. vi. are unexampled for rapidity even in Hebrew.

And yet the flow of his words is smooth and measured. Without departing from the conciseness of Hebrew poetry, his cadence, for the most part, is of the more prolonged sort, as far as any can be called prolonged, when all is so concise. In some 8 verses, out of 104, he is markedly brief, where conciseness corresponds with his subject, as in an abrupt appeal as to their sins<sup>h</sup>, or an energetic announcement of judgment<sup>i</sup> or of mercy<sup>k</sup>, or in that remarkable prophecy of both<sup>l</sup>, how God would, in mercy, cut off all grounds of human trust. Else, whereas in Nahum and Habakkuk, not quite  $\frac{1}{3}$ , and in the eleven last Chapters of Hosea much less than  $\frac{1}{3}$ , of the verses contain more than 13 words<sup>m</sup>, in Micah above  $\frac{1}{2}$  (as, in Joel, nearly  $\frac{3}{4}$ ) exceed that number<sup>n</sup>. The verses are also distributed in that ever-varying cadence, whereby, in Hebrew poetry, portions of their short sentences being grouped together, the harmony of the whole is produced by the varied dispositions of these lesser groups of 2, 3, 4, and but rarely 5 words; scarcely any two verses exactly corresponding, but all being united by the blending of similar cadences. In Micah, as in all Hebrew poetry, the combination of 3 words is the most frequent, and this, sometimes by itself, sometimes in union with the number 4, making the sacred number 7; or, with 2, making a number which we find in the tabernacle, but which dwells more in the hearts of the disciples of the Crucified. The same exact rhythm seldom recurs, and that, naturally, chiefly in the shorter verses, the longer admitting or requiring more combinations. Wherever also there is more than one pause in the verse, a further and very considerable variety of rhythm may be produced, even when the several clauses of two verses contain the same number of words in the same order. The difference of cadence is far more influenced by the place, where the verse is divided, than by the exact number of words contained in it. The rhetorical force of the distribution of the words into the several clauses, depends mainly upon the place of the Athnach or semicolon<sup>o</sup>. The same exact rhythm, (in which both the same number of words occur in the verse, and the verse is divided in the same place) recurs only seven times in Micah, in verses capable of a variation. The other four cases of repetition occur in short verses which have one division only<sup>p</sup> according to the place where the main division of the verse falls.

dicating the lesser divisions into which each verse may be distributed. The comma in each set of numbers marks the place of the Athnach or semicolon. The Roman numerals indicate how often any cadence is repeated.

<sup>p</sup> The following summary of these lesser divisions, which are mostly marked by the Hebrew accents, may perhaps give some little idea of the rhythm. Only the degree of subdivision must often be a matter of opinion or taste or ear. Thus, of 5 words which grammatically belong together, one might think that the cadence separated them into 3 and 2; another might take them all together. But this is a matter of detail only; the principle is unmistakable. Again, words which have been artificially joined together in Hebrew by the Mukkeph, I have considered as 2 words, if each had a distinct idea. Thus, when the met sign of the object, I have not counted; when it is the preposition, "with," I have counted it. In the following list, the verses are ranged according to the number of the words contained in each verse, beginning with the highest. The numbers on the right hand in-

His description of the destruction of the cities or villages of Judah corresponds in vividness to Isaiah's ideal march of Sennacherib<sup>a</sup>. The flame of war spreads from place to place; but Micah relieves the sameness of the description of misery by every variety which language allows. He speaks of them in his own person<sup>c</sup>, or to them; he describes the calamity in past<sup>d</sup> or in future<sup>e</sup>, or by use of the imperative<sup>f</sup>. The verbal allusions are crowded together in a way unexampled elsewhere. Moderns have spoken of them, as not after their taste, or have apologised for them. The mighty Prophet, who wrought a repentance greater than his great contemporary Isaiah, knew well what would impress the people to whom he spoke. The Hebrew names had definite meanings. We can well imagine how, as name after name passed from the Prophet's mouth, connected with some note of woe, all around awaited anxiously, to know upon what place the fire of the Prophet's word would next fall; and as at last it had fallen upon little and mighty round about Jerusalem, the names of the places would ring in their ears as heralds of the coming woe; they would be like so many monuments, inscribed beforehand with the titles of departed greatness, reminding Jerusalem itself of its portion of the prophecy, that evil should come from the Lord unto the gate of Jerusalem.

Wonderful must have been his lightning-flash of indignation, as, when the false prophet or the people had forbidden God's word to be spoken, he burst upon them, Thou, called house of Jacob, shortened is God's Spirit? Or these His doings? And then follow the plaintive descriptions of the wrongs done to the poor, the peaceful<sup>g</sup>, the mothers of his people and their little ones. And then again the instantaneous dismissal, Arise and depart. But, therewith, wonderful also is his tenderness.

To facilitate comparison, I subjoin a like analysis of the other prophets mentioned.

Hoses, eleven last chapters.

Burning as are his denunciations against the oppressions of the rich<sup>b</sup>, (words less vehement will not pierce hearts of stone) there is an under-current of tenderness. His rebukes evince not indignation only against sin, but a tender sympathy with the sufferers. <sup>c</sup> He is afflicted in the afflictions which he has to denounce. He yearns for his people<sup>d</sup>; nay, until our Lord's Coming, there is scarcely an expression of such yearning longing: he hungers and thirsts for their good<sup>e</sup>.

God's individual care of His people, and of each soul in it, had, since David's time<sup>f</sup> and even since Jacob<sup>g</sup>, been likened to the care of the shepherd for each single sheep. The Psalms of Asaph<sup>h</sup> must have familiarised the people to the image, as relating to themselves as a whole, and David's deep Psalm had united it with God's tender care of His own in, and over, death. Yet the predominance of this image in Micah is a part of the tenderness of the Prophet. He adopts it, as expressing, more than any other natural image, the helplessness of the creature, the tender individual care of the Creator. He forestalls our Lord's words, I am the good shepherd, in his description of the Messiah, gathering the remnant of Israel together, as the sheep of Bozrah<sup>i</sup>; His people are as a flock, lame and despised<sup>k</sup>, whom God would assemble; His royal seat, the tower of the flock<sup>l</sup>; the Ruler of Israel should stand unresting, and feed them<sup>m</sup>; those whom He should employ against the enemies of His people, are shepherds<sup>n</sup>, under Him, the true shepherd. He sums up his prayer for his people to God as their Shepherd<sup>o</sup>; Feed Thy people with Thy rod, the flock of Thine heritage.

Directly, he was a Prophet for Judah only. At the beginning of his book, he condemns the idolatries of both capitals, as the central sin of the two kingdoms. The destruction of Samaria he pronounces at once, as future, absolutely certain, abiding<sup>p</sup>. There he leaves her, declares her wound incurable, and passes forthwith to Judah, to whom, he says, that wound should pass, whom that same enemy should reach<sup>q</sup>. Thereafter, he mentions incidentally the infection of Israel's sin spreading to Judah<sup>r</sup>. Else, after that first sentence on Samaria, the names of Jacob (which he had given to the ten tribes<sup>s</sup>) and Israel are appropriated to the kingdom of Judah<sup>t</sup>: Judah is mentioned no more, only her capital<sup>u</sup>; even her kings are called the kings of Israel<sup>v</sup>. The ten tribes are only included in the general restoration of the whole<sup>w</sup>. The future remnant of the two tribes, to be restored after the captivity of Babylon, are called by themselves the remnant of Jacob<sup>x</sup>: the Messiah to be born at Bethlehem is foretold as the ruler in Israel<sup>y</sup>: the ten tribes are called the remnant of His brethren, who were to return to the children of Israel<sup>z</sup>, i. e. Judah.

This the more illustrates the genuineness of the inscription. A later hand would have been unlikely to have mentioned either Samaria or those earlier kings of Judah. Each part of the title corresponds to something in the prophecy; the name Micah is alluded to at its close; his birthplace, the Morasthite, at its beginning; the indications of those earlier reigns lie there, although not on its surface<sup>c</sup>. The mention of the two capitals, followed by the immediate sentence on Samaria, and then by the fuller expansion of the sins and punishment of Jerusalem, culminating in its sentence<sup>d</sup>, in Micah, corresponds to the brief mention of the punishment of Judah in Amos the Prophet of Israel, and then the fuller expansion of the sins and punishments of Israel. Further, the capitals, as the fountains of idolatry, are the primary object of God's displeasure. They are both specially denounced in the course of the prophecy; their special overthrow is foretold<sup>e</sup>. The title corresponds with the contents of the prophecy, yet the objections of modern critics shew that the correspondence does not lie on the surface.

The taunt of the false priest Amaziah<sup>f</sup> to Amos may in itself suggest that prophets at Jerusalem did prophesy against Samaria. Amaziah, any how, thought it natural that they should. Both Isaiah and Micah, while exercising their office at Jerusalem, had regard also to Samaria. Divided as Israel and Judah were, Israel was not yet cut off. Israel and Judah were still, together, the one people of God. The prophets in each had a care for the other.

Micah joins himself on to the men of God before him, as Isaiah at the time, and Jeremiah, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Ezekiel, subsequently, employed words or thoughts of Micah<sup>g</sup>. Micah alludes to the history, the laws, the promises, the threatenings of the Pentateuch; and that in such wise, that it is plain that he had, not traditional laws or traditional history, but the Pentateuch itself before him<sup>h</sup>. Nor were those books before himself only. His book implies not an acquaintance only, but a familiar acquaintance with it on the part of the people. The title, the land of Nimrod<sup>i</sup>, the house of bondage<sup>k</sup>, for Egypt, the allusions to the miraculous deliverance from Egypt<sup>l</sup>, the history of Balaam; the whole summary of the mercies of God from the Exodus to Gilgal<sup>m</sup>, the faithfulness pledged to Abraham and Jacob<sup>n</sup>, would be unintelligible without the knowledge of the Pentateuch. Even single expressions are taken from the Pentateuch<sup>o</sup>. Especially, the whole sixth chapter is grounded upon it. Thence is the appeal to inanimate nature to hear the controversy; thence the mercies alleged on God's part; the offerings on man's part to atone to God (except the one dreadful superstition of Ahaz) are from the law; the answer on God's part is almost verbally from the law; the sins upbraided are sins forbidden in the law; the penalties pronounced are also those of the law. There are two allusions also to the history of Joshua<sup>p</sup>, to David's elegy over Saul and Jonathan<sup>q</sup>, and, as before said, to the history of Micah's son of Imlah in the book of Kings. Single expressions are also taken from the Psalms<sup>r</sup> and the Proverbs<sup>s</sup>. In the descriptions of the peace of the kingdom of Christ<sup>t</sup>, he appears purposely to have reversed God's description of the animosity of the nations against God's people<sup>u</sup>. He has also two characteristic expressions of Amos. Perhaps, in the image of the darkness which should come on the false prophets<sup>v</sup>, he applied anew the image of Amos, adding the ideas of spiritual darkness and perplexity to that of calamity.

The light and shadows of the prophetic life fell deeply on the soul of Micah. The captivity of Judah too had been foretold before him. Moses had foretold the end from the beginning, had set before them the captivity and the dispersion, as a punishment which the sins of the people would certainly bring upon them. Hosea presupposed it<sup>w</sup>; Amos foretold that Jerusalem, like the cities of its heathen enemies, should be burned with fire<sup>x</sup>. Micah had to declare its lasting desolation<sup>y</sup>. Even when God wrought repentance through him, he knew that it was but for a time; for he foresaw and foretold that the deliverance would be, not in Jerusalem, but at Babylon<sup>z</sup>, in captivity. His prophecy sank so deep, that, above a century afterwards, just when it was about to have its fulfilment, it was the prophecy which was remembered. But the sufferings of time disappeared in the light of eternal truth. Above seven centuries rolled by, and Micah re-appears as the herald, not now of sorrow but of salvation. Wise men from afar, in the nobility of their simple belief, asked, Where is he that is born King of the Jews? A king, jealous for his temporal empire, gathered all those learned in Holy Scripture, and echoed the question. The answer was given, unhesitatingly, as a well-known truth of God, in the words of Micah. For thus it is written in the Prophet. Glorious peerage of the two contemporary prophets of Judah. Ere Jesus was born, the Angel announced the birth of the Virgin's Son, God with us, in the words of Isaiah. When He was born, He was pointed out as the Object of worship to the first converts from the heathen, on the authority of God, through Micah.

CHAPTER I.

1 Micah sheweth the wrath of God against Jacob for idolatry. 10 He exhorteth to mourning.

• Jer. 26. 18.

THE word of the LORD that came to Micah the Morasthite in the days of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Ju-

CHAP. I. VER. 1. The word of the Lord that came to Micah—which he saw. No two of the prophets authenticate their prophecy in exactly the same way. They, one and all, have the same simple statement to make, that this which they say is from God, and through them. A later hand, had it added the titles, would have formed all upon one model. The title was an essential part of the prophetic book, as indicating to the people afterwards, that it was not written after the event. It was a witness, not to the prophet whose name it bears, but to God. The prophet bare witness to God, that what he delivered came from Him. The event bare witness to the prophet, that he said this truly, in that he knew what God alone could know,—futurity. Micah blends in one the facts, that he related in words given him by God, what he had seen spread before him in prophetic vision. His prophecy was, in one, the word of the Lord which came to him, and a sight which he saw.

Micah omits all mention of his father. His great predecessor was known as Micaiah son of Imlah. Micah, a villager, would be known only by the name of his native village. So Nahum names himself the Elkoshite; Jonah is related to be a native of Gath-hepher; Elijah, the Tishbite, a sojourner in the despised Gilead<sup>1</sup>; Elisha, of Abelmeholah; Jeremiah, of Anathoth; forerunners of Him, and taught by His Spirit Who willed to be born at Bethlehem, and, since this, although too little to be counted among the thousands of Judah, was yet a royal city and was to be the birth-place of the Christ, was known only as Jesus of Nazareth, the Nazarene. No prophet speaks of himself, or is spoken of, as born at Jerusalem, the holy city. They speak of themselves with titles of lowliness, not of greatness.

Micah dates his prophetic office from kings of Judah only, as the only kings of the line appointed by God. Kings of Israel are mentioned in addition, only by prophets of Israel. He names Samaria first, because, its iniquity being most nearly full, its punishment was the nearest.

2. Hear, all ye people, lit. hear, ye peoples, all of them. Some 140, or 150 years had flowed by, since Micaiah, son of Imlah, had closed his prophecy in these words. And now they burst out anew. From age to age the word of God holds its course, ever receiving new fulfilments, never dying out, until the end shall come. The signal fulfilment of the prophecy, to which the former Micaiah had called attention in these words, was an earnest of the fulfilment of this present message of God.

Hearken, O earth, and all that therein is. The peoples or nations are never Judah and Israel only: the earth and the fulness thereof is the well-known title of the whole earth<sup>2</sup> and all its inhabitants. Moses<sup>3</sup>, Asaph<sup>4</sup>, Isaiah<sup>5</sup>, call heaven and earth as witnesses against God's people. Jeremiah<sup>6</sup>, as Micah here, summons the nations and the earth. The contest between good and evil, sin and holiness, the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan, everywhere, but most chiefly where God's Presence is nearest, is a spectacle to the world, to angels and to men<sup>7</sup>. The nations are witnesses of God against His own people, so that these should not say, that it was for want of faithfulness or justice or power<sup>8</sup>, but in His righteous judgment, that He cast off whom He had chosen. So shall the Day of Judgment reveal His righteousness<sup>9</sup>. Hearken, O earth. The lifeless earth<sup>10</sup> trembles at the Presence of God, and so reproaches the dulness of man. By it he summons man to listen with great reverence to the Voice of God.

dah,<sup>b</sup> which he saw concerning Samaria and Jerusalem.

2 † Hear, all ye people; <sup>c</sup> hearken, O earth, and † all that therein is; and let the Lord God <sup>d</sup> be witness against you, the Lord from <sup>e</sup> his holy temple.

And let the Lord God be witness against you. Not in words, but in deeds ye shall know, that I speak not of myself but God in me, when, what I declare, He shall by His Presence fulfil. But the nations are appealed to, not merely because the judgments of God on Israel should be made known to them by the Prophets. He had not yet spoken of Israel or Judah, whereas he had spoken to the nations; hear, ye peoples. It seems then most likely that here too he is speaking to them. Every judgment is an earnest, a forerunner, a part, of the final judgment and an ensample of its principles. It is but "the last great link in the chain," which unites God's dealings in time with eternity. God's judgments on one imply a judgment on all. His judgments in time imply a Judgment beyond time. Each sinner feels in his own heart a response to God's visible judgments on another. Each sinful nation may read its own doom in the sentence on each other nation. God judges each according to his own measure of light and grace, accepted or refused. The Heathen shall be judged by the law written in their heart<sup>11</sup>; the Jew, by the law of Moses and the light of the prophets; Christians, by the law of Christ. The word, Christ saith<sup>12</sup>, that I have spoken, the same shall judge him at the last Day. God Himself foretold, that the heathen should know the ground of His judgments against His people<sup>13</sup>. All nations shall say, wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land? What meaneth the heat of this great anger? Then men shall say, Because they have forsaken the covenant of the Lord God of their fathers which He made with them, when He brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, &c. But in that the heathen knew why God so punished His people, they came so far to know the mind of God; and God, Who at no time<sup>14</sup> left Himself without witness, bore fresh witness to them, and, so far as they neglected it, against them. A Jew, wherever he is seen throughout the world, is a witness to the world of God's judgments against sin.

"<sup>15</sup> Christ, the faithful Witness, shall witness against those who do ill, for those who do well."

The Lord from His holy temple. Either that at Jerusalem, where God shewed and revealed Himself, or Heaven of which it was the image. As David says<sup>16</sup>, The Lord is in His holy temple; the Lord's throne is in heaven; and contrasts His dwelling in heaven and His coming down upon earth. <sup>1</sup> He bowed the heavens also and came down; and Isaiah, in like words <sup>2</sup>, Behold, the Lord cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity.

3. For, behold, the Lord cometh forth, i. e. (as we now say,) is coming forth. Each day of judgment, and the last also, are ever drawing nigh, noiselessly as the nightfall, but unceasingly. Out of His Place. "God is hidden from us, except when He sheweth Himself by His Wisdom or Power or Justice or Grace, as Isaiah saith <sup>4</sup>, Verily, Thou art a God Who hidest Thyself." He seemeth to be absent, when He doth not visibly work either in the heart within, or in judgments without; to the ungodly and unbelieving He is absent, <sup>5</sup> far above out of their sight, when He does not avenge their scoffs, their sins, their irreverence. Again He seemeth to go forth, when His Power is felt. "Whence it is said <sup>6</sup>, Bow Thy heavens, O Lord, and come down; and the Lord saith of Sodom <sup>7</sup>, I will go down now and see, whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto Me. Or, the Place of the Infinite God is God Himself. For the Infinite sustaineth Itself, nor doth anything out of Itself contain It. God dwelleth also in light unapproachable <sup>8</sup>. When then Almighty God doth not manifest Himself, He abideth, as it were, in His own Place. When He manifests His Power or Wisdom or Justice by their effects, He is said to go forth out of His Place, i. e. out of His hiddenness. Again, since the Nature of God is Goodness, it is proper and co-natural to Him, to be propitious, have mercy and spare. In this way, the Place of God is His mercy. When then He passeth from the sweetness of pity to the rigour of equity, and, on account of our sins, sheweth Himself severe (which is, as it were, alien from Him) He goeth forth out of His Place." "For He Who is gentle and gracious, and Whose Nature it is to have mercy, is constrained, on your account, to take the seeming of hardness, which is not His."

He comes invisibly now, in that it is He Who punisheth, through whatever power or will of man He useth; He shews forth His Holiness through the punishment of unholiness. But the words, which are image-language now, shall be most exactly fulfilled in the end, when, in the Person of our Lord, He shall come visibly to judge the world. "In the Day of Judgment, Christ shall come down, according to that Nature which He took, from His Place, the highest heavens, and shall cast down the proud things of this world."

And will come down; not by change of place, or in Himself, but as felt in the punishment of sin; and tread upon the high places of the earth; to bring down the pride of those <sup>11</sup> who "being lifted up in their own conceit and lofty, sinning through pride and proud through sin, were yet created out of earth. For <sup>13</sup> why is earth and ashes proud?" What seems mightiest and most firm, is unto God less than is to man the dust under his feet. The high places were also the special scenes of an unceasing idolatry. "God treadeth in the good and humble, in that He dwelleth, walketh, feasteth in their hearts <sup>14</sup>. But He treadeth upon the proud and the evil, in that He casteth them down, despiseth, condemneth them."

4. And the mountains shall be molten under Him. It has been thought that this is imagery, taken from volcanic eruptions <sup>15</sup>; but, although there is a very remarkable volcanic district just outside of Gilcad <sup>16</sup>, it is not thought to have been active at times so late as these; nor were the people to whom the words were said, familiar with it. Fire, the real agent at the end of the world, is, meanwhile, the symbol of God's anger, as being the most terrible of His instruments of destruction: whence God revealed Himself as a consuming fire <sup>17</sup>, and, at this same time said by Isaiah <sup>18</sup>; For behold, the Lord will come with fire—to render His anger with fury, and His rebuke with flames of fire.

And the valleys shall be cleft as wax before the fire. It seems natural that the mountains should be cleft; but the valleys <sup>19</sup>, so low already! This speaks of a yet deeper dissolution; of lower depths beyond our sight or knowledge, into the very heart of the earth. "This should they fear, who will to be so low; who, so far from lifting themselves to heavenly things, pour out their affections on things of earth, meditate on and love earthly things, and forgetful of the heavenly, choose to fix their eyes on earth. These the wide gaping of the earth which they loved, shall swallow: to them the cleft vallies shall open an everlasting sepulchre, and, having received them, shall never part with them."

Highest and lowest, first and last, shall perish before Him. The pride of the highest, kings and princes, priests and judges, shall sink and melt away beneath the weight and Majesty of His glory; the hardness of the lowest, which would not open itself to Him, shall be cleft in twain before Him.

As wax before the fire <sup>21</sup>, melting away before Him by Whom they were not softened, vanishing into nothingness. Metals melt, changing their form only; wax, so as to cease to be <sup>22</sup>.

As the waters poured down (as a stream or cataract, so the word means <sup>23</sup>) a steep place. Down to the very edge, it is borne along, one strong, smooth, unbroken current; then, at once, it seems to gather its strength, for one great effort. But to what end? To fall, with the greater force, headlong, scattered in spray, foam and froth; dissipated, at times, into vapour, or reeling in giddy eddies, never to return. In Judæa, where the autumn rains set in with great vehemence <sup>24</sup>, the waters must have been often seen pouring in their little tumultuous brooklets down the mountainside <sup>25</sup>, hastening to disappear, and disappearing the faster, the more vehemently they rolled along <sup>26</sup>.

Mount Hermon is extremely rapid and has a very steep fall to the Hasbeia which it joins in Merj-el-Huleh. The Jordan is a continual cataract between el-Huleh and the Lake of Gennesareth; (Rev. G. Williams, MS. letter) "a fall of 600 feet in about 10 miles. On the Western bank, high above the rocky bed of the torrent, the water was running rapidly down the steep incline towards the river, which could hardly be less than 150 feet below us" (Id. Col. Church Chron. 1860. Jan. p. 30.). Porter describes the fall of the river Adonis (Five years, ii. 295.). From the height at which the streams rise in the Lebanon chain, there must be many greater or lesser falls. <sup>27</sup> Hence the Hebrew name <sup>28</sup>, "heavy rain," for which we have no one word, is used of the autumn and winter rain, Cant. ii. 11. <sup>29</sup> I have seen this effect for above half an hour (15 miles) on the mountain country near the lakes in a thunderstorm. <sup>30</sup> "The decrease of the waters (swollen by the rains in the mountains) is usually as rapid as their rise." Burckhardt, Syria, p. 161.

Both images exhibit the inward emptiness of sinners, man's utter helplessness before God. They need no outward impulse to their destruction. "Wax endureth not the nearness of the fire, and the waters are carried headlong. So all of the ungodly, when the Lord cometh, shall be dissolved and disappear." At the end of the world, they shall be gathered into bundles, and cast away.

5. For the transgression of Jacob is all this. Not for any change of purpose in God; nor, again, as the effect of man's lust of conquest. None could have any power against God's people, unless it had been given him by God. Those mighty Monarchies of old existed but as God's instruments, especially towards His own people. God said at this time of Assyria, <sup>2</sup> Asshur, rod of Mine anger, and the staff in his hand is Mine indignation; and <sup>3</sup> Now have I brought it to pass, that thou shouldest be to lay waste defended cities into ruinous heaps. Each scourge of God chastised just those nations, which God willed him to chasten; but the especial object for which each was raised up was his mission against that people, in whom God most shewed His mercies and His judgments. <sup>4</sup> I will send him against an ungodly nation and against the people of My wrath will I give him a charge. Jacob and Israel, in this place, comprise alike the ten tribes and the two. They still bare the name of their father, who, wrestling with the Angel, became a prince with God, Whom they forgot. The name of Jacob then, as of Christian now, stamped as deserters, those who did not the deeds of their father. What, [rather Who<sup>5</sup>] is the transgression of Jacob? Who is its cause? In whom does it lie? Is it not Samaria? The metropolis must, in its own nature, be the source of good or evil to the land. It is the heart whose pulses beat throughout the whole system. As the seat of power, the residence of justice or injustice, the place of counsel, the concentration of wealth, which all the most influential of the land visit for their several occasions, its manners penetrate in a degree the utmost corners of the land. Corrupted, it becomes a focus of corruption. The blood passes through it, not to be purified, but to be diseased. Samaria, being founded on apostacy, owing its being to rebellion against God, the home of that policy which set up a rival system of worship to His, forbidden by Him, became a fountain of evil, whence the stream of ungodliness overflowed the land. It became the impersonation of the people's sin, "the heart and the head of the body of sin."

And what [lit. Who<sup>5</sup>] are the high places of Judah? are they not Jerusalem? Jerusalem God had formed to be a centre of unity in holiness; thither the tribes of the Lord were to go up to the testimony of Israel; there was the unceasing worship of God, the morning and evening sacrifice; the Feasts, the memorials of past miraculous mercies, the foreshadowings of redemption. But there too Satan placed his throne. Ahaz brought thither that most hateful idolatry, the burning children to Moloch in the valley of the son of Hinnom<sup>6</sup>. There, he made him altars in every corner of Jerusalem. Thence, he extended the idolatry to all Judah. <sup>8</sup> And in every several city of Judah he made high places to burn incense unto other gods, and provoked to anger the Lord God of his fathers. Hezekiah, in his reformation, with all Israel, <sup>9</sup> went out to the cities of Judah, and brake the images in pieces and hewed down the statues of Asherah, and threw down the high places and the altars out of all Judah and Benjamin, as much as out of Ephraim and Manasseh. Nay, by a perverse interchange, Ahaz took the brazen altar, consecrated to God, for his own divinations, and assigned to the worship of God the altar copied from the idol-altar at Damascus, whose fashion pleased his taste<sup>10</sup>. Since God and mammon cannot be served together, Jerusalem was become one great idol-temple, in which Judah brought its sin into the very face of God and of His worship. The Holy City had itself become sin, and the fountain of unholiness. The one temple of God was the single protest against the idolatries which encompassed and besieged it; the incense went up to God, morning and evening, from it; from every head of every street of the city<sup>11</sup>, and (since Ahaz had brought in the worship of Baalim<sup>12</sup>, and the rites of idolatry continued the same,) from the roofs of all their houses<sup>13</sup>, went up the incense to Baal; a worship which, denying the Unity, denied the Being of God.

6. Therefore [lit. And] I will make Samaria as an heap of the field, and as plantings of a vineyard. "The order of the sin was the order of the punishment." Samaria's sins were the earliest, the most obstinate, the most unbroken, bound up with its being as a state. On it then God's judgments should first fall. It was a crown of pride<sup>14</sup>, resting on the head of the rich valleys, out of which it rose. Its soil is still rich<sup>15</sup>. "The whole is now cultivated in terraces<sup>16</sup>," "to the summits<sup>17</sup>." Probably, since the sides of hills, open to the sun, were chosen for vineyards, it had been a vineyard, before Shemer sold it to Omri<sup>18</sup>. What it had been, that it was again to be. Its inhabitants cast forth, its houses and gorgeous palaces were to become heaps of stones, gathered out<sup>19</sup> to make way for cultivation, or to become the fences of the vegetation, which should succeed to man. There is scarce a sadder natural sight, than the fragments of human habitation, tokens of man's labour or his luxury, amid the rich beauty of nature when man himself is gone. For they are tracks of sin and punishment, man's rebellion and God's judgment, man's unworthiness of the good natural gifts of God. A century or two ago, travellers<sup>20</sup> speak of the ground [the site of Samaria] as strewn with masses of ruins." Now these too are gone. "The stones of the temples and palaces of Samaria have been carefully removed from the rich soil, thrown together in heaps, built up in the rude walls of terraces, and rolled down into the valley below." "About midway of the ascent, the hill is surrounded by a narrow terrace of woodland like a belt. Higher up too are the marks of slighter terraces, once occupied perhaps by the streets of the ancient city." Terrace-cultivation has succeeded to the terraced streets once thronged by the busy, luxurious, sinful, population.

And I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley, of which it was the crest, and which it now proudly surveyed. God Himself would cause it to be poured down (he uses the word which he had just used of the vehemence of the cataract <sup>1</sup>). "The whole face of this part of the hill suggests the idea that the buildings of the ancient city had been thrown down from the brow of the hill. Ascending to the top, we went round the whole summit, and found marks of the same process everywhere."

And I will discover the foundations thereof. The desolation is entire; not one stone left upon another. Yet the very words of threatening contain hope. It was to be not a heap only, but the plantings of a vineyard. The heaps betoken ruin; the vineyard, fruitfulness cared for by God. Destroyed, as what it was, and turned upside down, as a vineyard by the share, it should become again what God made it and willed it to be. It should again become a rich valley, but in outward desolation. Its splendid palaces, its idol temples, its houses of joy, should be but heaps and ruins, which are cleared away out of a vineyard, as only choking it. It was built in rebellion and schism, loose and not held together, like a heap of stones, having no cement of love, rent and torn in itself, having been torn both from God and His worship. It could be remade only by being wholly unmade. Then should they who believed be branches grafted in Him Who said, <sup>3</sup> I am the Vine, ye are the branches.

7. And all the graven images thereof shall be beaten to pieces. Its idols in whom she trusts, so far from protecting her, shall themselves go into captivity, broken up for the gold and silver whereof they were made. The wars of the Assyrians being religious wars <sup>4</sup>, the idolatry of Assyria destroyed the idolatry and idols of Israel.

And all the hires thereof shall be burned with fire. All forsaking of God being spiritual fornication from Him Who made His creatures for Himself, the hires are all which man would gain by that desertion of his God, all employed in man's intercourse with his idols, whether as bribing his idols to give him what are the gifts of God, or as himself bribed by them. For there is no pure service, save that of the love of God. God alone can be loved purely, for Himself; offerings to Him Alone are the creature's pure homage to the Creator, going out of itself, not looking back to itself, not seeking itself, but stretching forth to Him and seeking Him for Himself. Whatever man gives to or hopes from his idols, man himself is alike his object in both. The hire then is, alike what he gives to his idols, the gold whereof he makes his Baal <sup>5</sup>, the offerings which the heathen used to lay up in their temples, and what, as he thought, he himself received back. For he gave only earthly things, in order to receive back things of earth. He hired their service to him, and his earthly gains were his hire. It is a strong mockery in the mouth of God, that they had these things from their idols. He speaks to them after their thoughts. Yet it is true that, although God overrules all, man does receive from Satan <sup>6</sup>, the god of this world <sup>7</sup>, all which he gains amiss. It is the price for which he sells his soul and profanes himself. Yet herein were the heathen more religious than the Christian worldling. The heathen did offer an ignorant service to they knew not what. Our idolatry of mammon, as being less abstract, is more evident self-worship, a more visible ignoring and so a more open dethroning of God, a worship of a material prosperity, of which we seem ourselves to be the authors, and to which we habitually immolate the souls of men, so habitually that we have ceased to be conscious of it.

And all the idols thereof will I lay desolate, lit. make a desolation. They, now thronged by their worshippers, should be deserted; their place and temple, a waste. He thrice repeats all; all her graven images, all her hires, all her idols; all should be destroyed. He subjoins a threefold destruction which should overtake them; so that, while the Assyrian broke and carried off the more precious, or burned what could be burned, and, what could not be burned, nor was worth transporting, should be left desolate, all should come to an end. He sets the whole the more vividly before the mind, exhibiting to us so many separate pictures of the mode of destruction.

For from the hire of a harlot she gathered them, and to the hire of a harlot they shall return. "The wealth and manifold provision which (as she thought) were gained by fornication with her idols, shall go to another harlot, Nineveh; so that, as they went a whoring in their own land, they should go to another land of idols and fornication, the Assyrians." They <sup>8</sup> turned their glory into shame, changing the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like unto corruptible man; and so it should turn to them into shame. It sprung out of their shame, and should turn to it again. "Ill got, ill spent." Evil gain, cursed in its origin, has the curse of God upon it, and makes its gainer a curse, and ends accursedly. "Make not ill gains," says even a Heathen <sup>10</sup>, "ill gains are equal to losses;" and another <sup>11</sup>, "Unlawful sweetness a most bitter end awaiteth."

Probably, the most literal sense is not to be excluded. The degrading idolatrous custom, related of Babylon and Cyprus <sup>12</sup>, still continued among the Babylonians at the date of the book of Baruch <sup>13</sup>, and to the Christian era <sup>14</sup>. S. Augustine speaks of it as having existed <sup>15</sup> among the Phœnicians, and Theodoret <sup>16</sup> says that it was still practised by some in Syria. The existence of the idolatrous custom is presupposed by the prohibition by Moses <sup>17</sup>; and, in the time of Hosea self-desecration was an idolatrous rite in Israel <sup>18</sup>. In the day of Judgment, when the foundation of those who build their house upon the sand, shall be laid bare, the riches which they gained unlawfully shall be burned up; all the idols, which they set up instead of God, <sup>19</sup> the vain thoughts, and useless fancies, and hurtful forms and images which they picture in their mind, defiling it, and hindering it from the steadfast contemplation of divine things, will be punished. They were the hire of the soul which went astray from God, and they who conceived them will, with them, become the prey again of that infernal host which is unceasingly turned from God.

breast], and howl. 'Let me alone,' he would say, 'that I may vent my sorrow in all ways of expressing sorrow, beating on the breast and wailing, using all acts and sounds of grief.' It is as we would say, 'Let me mourn on,' a mourning inexhaustible, because the woe too and the cause of grief was unceasing. The Prophet becomes in words, probably in acts too, an image of his people, doing as they should do hereafter. He mourns, because and as they would have to mourn, bearing chastisement, bereft of all outward comeliness, an example also of repentance, since what he did were the chief outward tokens of mourning.

I will [would] go stripped [despoiled<sup>1</sup>] and naked. He explains the acts, that they represented no mere voluntary mourning. Not only would he, representing them, go bared of all garments of beauty, as we say "half-naked<sup>2</sup>" but despoiled also, the proper term of those plundered and stripped by an enemy. He speaks of his doing, what we know that Isaiah did, by God's command, representing in act what his people should thereafter do. "Wouldest thou that I should weep, thou must thyself grieve the first." Micah doubtless went about, not speaking only of grief, but grieving, in the halit of one mourning and bereft of all. He prolongs in these words the voice of wailing, choosing unwonted forms of words, to carry on the sound of grief<sup>4</sup>.

I will make a wailing like the dragons [jackals<sup>5</sup>] and mourning as the owls [ostriches<sup>6</sup>]. The cry of both, as heard at night, is very piteous. Both are doleful creatures, dwelling in desert and lonely places. "The<sup>7</sup> jackals make a lamentable howling noise, so that travellers unacquainted with them would think that a company of people, women or children, were howling, one to another." "Its howl," says an Arabic natural historian<sup>8</sup>, "is like the crying of an infant." "We heard them", says another<sup>9</sup>, "through the night, wandering around the villages, with a continual, prolonged, mournful cry." The ostrich, forsaking its young<sup>10</sup>, is an image of bereavement. "As the ostrich forgets her eggs and leaves them as though they were not her's, to be trampled by the feet of wild beasts, so too shall I go childless, spoiled and naked." Its skreech is spoken of by travellers as "fearful, affrighting." "During the lonesome part of the night they often make a doleful and piteous noise. I have often heard them groan, as if they were in the greatest agonies."

I will grieve from the heart over those who perish, mourning for the hardness of the ungodly, as the Apostle had<sup>15</sup> great heaviness and continual sorrow in his heart for his brethren, the impenitent and unbelieving Jews. Again he saith<sup>16</sup>, who is weak and I am not weak? Who is offended, and I burn not?

<sup>1</sup> Barefoot is expressed in Hebrew by נָגַד. Since then Micah does not use the received term for barefoot, and does use the word expressing "stripped," "despoiled," the E. V. is doubtless right, agreeing with the Latin against the LXX. and Syr. <sup>2</sup> See on Amos ii. 16. p. 178. n. 6. Seneca says: "Some things, though not [exactly] true, are comprised under the same word, for their likeness. So we call illiterate, one not altogether uneducated, but who has not been advanced to higher knowledge. So he who has seen one illhabited and in rags, says that he has seen one naked." de benef. v. 13. Sanch. <sup>3</sup> Hor. A. P. 102, 3. <sup>4</sup> נָגַד and נָגַד carry on the sound of נָגַד, the textual reading, is doubtless right, although without example; נָגַד has analogy with other words, but, common as the word is, stands alone in the word itself. Each bears out the other. <sup>5</sup> The נָגַד, which occurs only in the plural נָגַדִּים, is distinct from the נָגַד, plur. נָגַדִּים, although they touch on each other, in that נָגַד sing. is written נָגַד, Ezek. xxix. 3, and the poetic plur. of נָגַד occurs in the text, Lam. iv. 3. The Syr. (and Chaldee, properly) and Tanchum oftentimes render it "jackal." Pococke first, of moderns, brought out this meaning. See his note here. <sup>6</sup> The נָגַד נָגַד "female ostrich" (the נָגַד probably is come unto Judah; he is come unto the gate of my people, even to Jerusalem.

10 ¶ Declare ye it not at Gath, weep 2 Sam. 1. 20.

For by how much the soul is nobler than the body, and by how much eternal damnation is heavier than any temporal punishment, so much more vehemently should we grieve and weep for the peril and perpetual damnation of souls, than for bodily sickness or any temporal evil."

9. For her [Samaria's] wound<sup>17</sup>, [lit. her wounds, or strokes, (the word is used especially of those inflicted by God<sup>18</sup>.) each, one by one,] is incurable. The idiom is used of inflictions on the body politic<sup>19</sup> or the mind<sup>20</sup>, for which there is no remedy. The wounds were very sick, or incurable, not in themselves or on God's part, but on Israel's. The day of grace passes away at last, when man has so steeled himself against grace, as to be morally dead, having deadened himself to all capacity of repentance.

For it is come unto [quite up to<sup>21</sup>] Judah; he, [the enemy,] is come [lit. hath reached, touched,] to [quite up to<sup>21</sup>] the gate of my people, even to [quite up to<sup>21</sup>] Jerusalem. "The same sin, yea, the same punishment for sin, which overthrew Samaria, shall even come unto, quite up to Judah. Then the Prophet suddenly changes the gender, and, as Scripture so often does, speaks of the one agent, the centre and impersonation of the coming evil, as sweeping on over Judah, quite up to the gate of his people, quite up to Jerusalem. He does not say here, whether Jerusalem would be taken<sup>22</sup>; and so, it seems likely that he speaks of a calamity short of excision. Of Israel's wounds only he here says, that they are incurable; he describes the wasting of even lesser places near or beyond Jerusalem, the flight of their inhabitants. Of the capital itself he is silent, except that the enemy reached, touched, struck against it, quite up to it. Probably, then, he is here describing the first visitation of God, when<sup>23</sup> Sennacherib came up against all the fenced cities of Judah and took them, but Jerusalem was spared. God's judgments come step by step, leaving time for repentance. The same enemy, although not the same king, came against Jerusalem who had wasted Samaria. Samaria was probably as strong as Jerusalem. Hezekiah prayed; God heard, the Assyrian army perished by miracle; Jerusalem was respited for 124 years.

10. Tell it not in Gath. Gath had probably now ceased to be; at least, to be of any account<sup>24</sup>. It shows how David's elegy lived in the hearts of Judah, that his words are used as a proverb, (just as we do now, in whose ears it is yearly read), when, as with us, its original application was probably lost. True, Gath, reduced itself, might rejoice the more maliciously over the sufferings of Judah. But David mentions it as a chief seat of Philistine strength<sup>25</sup>; now its strength was gone.

judgments upon her. Maroth is mentioned here only in Holy Scripture, and has not been identified. It too was probably selected for its meaning. The inhabitant of bitternesses, she, to whom bitternesses, or, it may be, rebellions<sup>1</sup>, were as the home in which she dwelt, which ever encircled her, in which she reposed, wherein she spent her life, waited for good! Strange contradiction! yet a contradiction, which the whole un-Christian world is continually enacting; nay, from which Christians have often to be awakened, to look for good to themselves, nay, to pray for temporal good, while living in bitternesses, bitter ways, displeasing to God. The words are calculated to be a religious proverb. "Living in sin," as we say, dwelling in bitternesses, she looked for good! Bitternesses! for it is<sup>2</sup> an evil thing and bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God, and that My fear is not in thee.

But [For] evil came down from the Lord unto the gate of Jerusalem. It came, like the brimstone and fire which God rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah, but as yet to the gate of Jerusalem, not upon itself. “<sup>3</sup> Evil came down upon them from the Lord, i. e. I was grieved, I chastened, I brought the Assyrian upon them, and from My anger came this affliction upon them. But it was removed, My Hand prevailing and marvellously rescuing those who worshipped My Majesty. For the trouble shall come to the gate. But we know that Rabshakeh, with many horsemen, came to Jerusalem and all-but touched the gates. But he took it not. For in one night the Assyrian was consumed.” The two for's are seemingly co-ordinate, and assign the reasons of the foreannounced evils <sup>4</sup>, on man's part and on God's. On man's, in that he looked for what could not so come, good: on God's, in that evil, which alone could be looked for, which, amid man's evil, could alone be good for man, came from Him. Losing the true Good, man lost all other good, and dwelling in the bitterness of sin and provocation, he dwelt indeed in bitterness of trouble.

O thou inhabitant of Lachish, bind the chariot to the swift beast [steed.] Lachish was always a strong city, as its name probably denoted, (probably "compact."<sup>5</sup>) It was one of the royal cities of the Amorites, and its king one of the five, who went out to battle with Joshua<sup>6</sup>. It lay in the low country, Shephêlah, of Judah<sup>7</sup>, between Adoraim and Azekah<sup>8</sup>, 7 Roman miles S. of Eleutheropolis<sup>9</sup>, and so, probably, close to the hill-country, although on the plain; partaking perhaps of the advantages of both. Rehoboam fortified it. Amaziah fled to it from the conspiracy at Jerusalem<sup>10</sup>, as a place of strength. It, with Azekah, alone remained, when Nebuchadnezzar had taken the rest, just before the capture of Jerusalem<sup>11</sup>. When Sennacherib took all the defenced cities of Judah, it seems to have been his last and proudest conquest, for from it he sent his contemptuous message to Hezekiah<sup>12</sup>. The whole power of the great king seems to have been called forth to take this stronghold. The Assyrian bas-reliefs, the record of the conquests of Sennacherib, if (as the accompanying inscription is decyphered,) they represent the taking of Lachish, exhibit it as "<sup>13</sup> a city of great extent and importance, defended by double walls with battlements and towers, and by fortified outworks. In no other sculptures were so many armed warriors drawn up in array against a besieged city. Against the fortifications had been thrown up as many as ten banks or mounts compactly built,—and seven battering-rams had already been rolled up against the walls." Its situation, on the extremity probably of the plain, fitted it for a depôt of cavalry. The swift steeds <sup>14</sup>, to which it was bidden to bind the chariot, are mentioned as part of the magnificence of Solomon, as distinct from his ordinary horses <sup>15</sup>. They were used by the posts of the king of Persia <sup>16</sup>. They were doubtless part of the strength of the kings of Judah, the cavalry in which their statesmen trusted, instead of God. Now, its swift horses in which it prided itself should avail but to flee. Probably, it is an ideal picture. Lachish is bidden to bind its chariots to horses of the utmost speed, which should carry them far away, if their strength were equal to their swiftness. It had great need; for it was subjected under Sennacherib to the consequences of Assyrian conquest. If the Assyrian accounts relate to its capture, impalement and flaying alive <sup>17</sup> were among the tortures of the captive-people: and awefully did Sennacherib, in his pride, avenge the sins against God Whom he disbelieved.

 “<sup>18</sup>She was as the gate through which the transgressions of Israel flooded Judah.” How she came first to apostatise and to be the infectress of Judah, Scripture does not tell us <sup>19</sup>. She scarcely bordered on Philistia; Jerusalem lay between her and Israel. But the course of sin follows no geographical lines. It was the greater sin to Lachish that she, locally so far removed from Israel’s sin, was the first to import into Judah the idolatries of Israel. Scripture does not say, what seduced Lachish herself, whether the pride of military strength, or her importance, or commercial intercourse, for her swift steeds, with Egypt, the common parent of Israel’s and her sin. Scripture does not give the genealogy of her sin, but stamps her as the heresiarch of Judah. We know the fact from this place only, that she, apparently so removed from the occasion of sin, became, like the propagators of heresy, the authoress of evil, the cause of countless loss of souls. Beginning of sin to—, what a world of evil lies in the three<sup>20</sup> words!

14. Therefore shalt thou give [bridal] presents to Moresheth Gath. Therefore! since Judah had so become a partaker of Israel's sins, she had broken the covenant, whereby God had given her the land of the Heathen, and she should part with it to aliens. The bridal presents, lit. the dismissals, were the dowry<sup>21</sup>

as it has not in the sense of the E. M., "was grieved." Such an idiom as חל לשוב, "to be in pain for (lost) good," does not occur in Hebrew, and would be equivocal, since the idiom is used for "longed for (expected) good." חל also, "grieved," occurs only Jer. v. 3. Used of the "withering" of the birth-pangs, it is joined with no preparation, in the sense "teared," it is joined only with פחד, פני, פחד, the object of fear.

with which the father sent away<sup>1</sup> his daughter, to belong to another, her lord<sup>2</sup> or husband, never more to return. Moresheth, [lit. inheritance,] the inheritance which God gave her, was to be parted with; she was to be laden<sup>3</sup> with gifts to the enemy. Judah should part with her, and her own treasure also.

The houses of Achzib shall be a lie. Achzib, so called probably from a winter brook (achzab) was to become what its name imported, a resource which should fail just in the time of need, as the winter brooks in the drought of summer. <sup>4</sup> Wilt Thou be unto me as a failing brook, waters which are not sure? This Achzib, which is recounted between Keilah and Mareshah<sup>5</sup>, was probably one of the oldest towns of Palestine, being mentioned in the history of the Patriarch Judah<sup>6</sup>. After having survived above 1000 years, it should, in time of need, fail. The kings of Israel are here the kings of Judah. When this prophecy was to be accomplished, the ten tribes would have ceased to have any political existence, the remnant in their own land would have no head to look to, except the line of David, whose good kings had a care for them. Micah then, having prophesied the utter destruction of Samaria, speaks in accordance with the state of things which he foresaw and foretold<sup>7</sup>.

15. Yet will I bring an heir [the heir<sup>8</sup>, him whom God had appointed to be the heir, Sennacherib] unto thee, O inhabitant of Mareshah. Mareshah, (as the original form of its name denotes<sup>9</sup>), lay on the summit of a hill. "Its ruins only were still seen," in the time of Eusebius and S. Jerome, "in the second mile from Eleutheropolis"<sup>10</sup>, "Foundations still remain on the south eastern part of the remarkable Tell, south of Beth-Jibrin." Rehoboam fortified it also<sup>12</sup>. Zerah the Ethiopian had come to<sup>13</sup> it, probably to besiege it, when Asa met him, and God smote the Ethiopians before him, in the valley of Zephathah thereat. In the wars of the Maccabees, it was in the hands of the Edomites<sup>14</sup>. Its capture and that of Adora are mentioned<sup>15</sup> as the last act of the war, before the Edomites submitted to John Hyrcanus, and were incorporated in Israel. It was a powerful city<sup>16</sup>, when the Parthians took it. As Micah writes the name, it looked nearer to the word "inheritance"<sup>17</sup>. Mareshah (inheritance) shall yet have the heir of God's appointment, the enemy. It shall not inherit the land, as promised to the faithful, but shall itself be inherited, its people dispossessed. While it, (and so also the soul now) held fast to God, they were the heritage of the Lord, by His gifts and grace; when, of their own free-will, those, once God's heritage, become slaves of sin, they passed and still pass, against their will, into the possession of another master, the Assyrian or Satan.

the glory of Israel<sup>18</sup>; i. e. he who shall dispossess Mareshah, shall come quite unto Adullam, where, as in a place of safety, the glory of Israel, all in which she gloried, should be laid up. Adullam was a very ancient city, being mentioned in the history of the patriarch Judah<sup>19</sup>, a royal city<sup>20</sup>. It too lay in the Shephelah<sup>21</sup>; it was said to be 10<sup>22</sup> or 12<sup>23</sup> miles East of Eleutheropolis; but for this, there seems to be scarcely place in the Shephelah. It was one of the 15 cities fortified by Rehoboam<sup>24</sup>; one of the 16 towns, in which (with their dependant villages) Judah settled after the captivity<sup>25</sup>. It contained the whole army of Judas Maccabæus<sup>26</sup>. Like Lachish, it had probably the double advantages of the neighbourhood of the hills and of the plain, seated perhaps at the roots of the hills, since near it doubtless was the large cave of Adullam named from it. The line of caves, fit for human habitation, which extended from Eleutheropolis to Petra<sup>27</sup>, began Westward of it. "The valley which runs up from Eleutheropolis Eastward, is full of large caves; some would hold thousands of men. They are very extensive, and some of them had evidently been inhabited." "The outer chamber of one cavern was 270 feet long by 126 wide; and behind this were recesses and galleries, probably leading to other chambers which we could not explore. The massive roof was supported by misshaped pieces of the native limestone left for that purpose, and at some places was domed quite through to the surface, admitting both light and air by the roof." The name of Adullam suggested the memory of that cave, the refuge of the Patriarch David, the first of their line of kings, in extreme isolation and peril of his life. Thither, the refuge now of the remaining glory of Israel, its wealth, its trust, its boast,—the foe should come. And so there only remained one common dirge for all.

16. Make thee bald, poll [lit. shear<sup>29</sup>] thee for thy delicate children. Some special ways of cutting the hair were forbidden to the Israelites, as being idolatrous customs, such as the rounding the hair in front, cutting it away from the temples<sup>30</sup>, or between the eyes<sup>31</sup>. All shearing of the hair was not forbidden<sup>32</sup>; indeed to the Nazarite it was commanded, at the close of his vow. The removal of that chief ornament of the countenance was a natural expression of grief, which revolts at all personal appearance. It belonged, not to idolatry, but to nature<sup>33</sup>. Thy delicate children. The change was the more bitter for those tended and brought up delicately. Moses from the first spake of special miseries which should fall on the tender and very delicate. Enlarge thy baldness; outdo in grief what others do; for the cause of thy grief is more than that of others. The point of comparison in the Eagle might either be the actual baldness of the head, or its moulting. If it were the baldness of the head, the word translated eagle<sup>34</sup>, imaginations. Man's last and first thoughts, if not of good, are especially of vanity and evil. The Psalmist says<sup>1</sup>, Lord, have I not remembered Thee in my bed, and thought upon Thee when I was waking? These men thought of sin on their bed, and did it on waking. When the morning is light, lit. in the light of the morning, i. e. instantly, shamelessly, not shrinking from the light of day, not ignorantly, but knowingly, deliberately, in full light. Nor again through infirmity, but in the wantonness of might, because it is in the power of their hand<sup>2</sup>, as, of old, God said<sup>3</sup>, This they begin to do, and now nothing will be restrained from them which they have imagined to do. <sup>4</sup> "Impiously mighty, and mighty in impiety."

<sup>5</sup> See the need of the daily prayer, "Vouchsafe, O Lord, to keep us this day without sin;" and "Almighty God, Who hast brought us to the beginning of this day, defend us in the same by Thy mighty power, that we may fall into no sin, &c." The illusions of the night, if such be permitted, have no power against the prayer of the morning.

2. And they covet fields and take them by violence, [rend them away] and houses, and take them away. Still, first they sin in heart, then in act. And yet, with them, to covet and to rob, to desire and to take, are the same. They were prompt, instantaneous, without a scruple, in violence. So soon as they coveted, they took<sup>6</sup>. Desired, acquired! Coveted, robbed! "They saw, they coveted, they took," had been their past history. They did violence, not to one only, but, touched with no mercy, to whole families, their little ones also; they oppressed a man and his house. They spoiled not goods only, but life, a man and his inheritance; destroying him by false accusations or violence and so seizing upon his inheritance<sup>7</sup>. Thus Ahab first coveted Naboth's vineyard, then, through Jezebel, slew him; and <sup>8</sup> "they who devoured widows' houses, did at the last plot by night against Him of Whom they said, Come, let us kill Him and the inheritance shall be our's; and in the morning, they practised it, leading Him away to Pilate." <sup>9</sup> "Who of us desires not the villas of this world, forgetful of the possessions of Paradise? You see men join field to field, and fence to fence. Whole places suffice not to the tiny frame of one man." <sup>10</sup> Such is the fire of concupiscence, raging within, that, as those seized by burning fevers cannot rest, no bed suffices them, so no houses or fields content these. Yet no more than seven feet of earth will suffice them soon. <sup>11</sup> Death only owns, how small the frame of man."

3. Such had been their habitual doings. They had done all this, he says, as one continuous act, up to that time. They were habitually devisers of iniquity, doers of evil<sup>12</sup>. It was ever-renewed. By night they sinned in heart and thought; by day, in act. And so he speaks of it in the present. They do it<sup>13</sup>. But, although renewed in fresh acts, it was one unbroken course of acting. And so he also uses the form, in which the Hebrews spoke of uninterrupted habits, They have Therefore, thus saith the Lord, since they oppress whole families, behold I will set Myself against this whole family<sup>15</sup>; since they devise iniquity, behold I too, Myself, by Myself, in My own Person, am devising. Very awful is it, that Almighty God sets His own Infinite Wisdom against the devices of man and employs it fittingly to punish. "I am devising no common punishment, but one to bow them down without escape; an evil from which—He turns suddenly to them, ye shall not remove your necks, neither shall ye go haughtily." <sup>16</sup> Pride then was the source of that boundless covetousness," since it was pride which was to be bowed down in punishment. The punishment is proportioned to the sin. They had done all this in pride; they should have the liberty and self-will wherein they had wanted, tamed or taken from them. Like animals with a heavy yoke upon them, they should live in disgraced slavery. The ten tribes were never able to withdraw their necks from the yoke. From the two tribes God removed it after the 70 years. But the same sins against the love of God and man brought on the same punishment. Our Lord again spake the woe against their covetousness<sup>16</sup>. It still shut them out from the service of God, or from receiving Him, their Redeemer. They still spoiled the goods<sup>17</sup> of their brethren. In the last dreadful siege, <sup>18</sup> there were insatiable longings for plunder, searching-out of the houses of the rich; murder of men and insults of women were enacted as sports; they drank down what they had spoiled, with blood." And so the prophecy was for the third time fulfilled. They who withdraw from Christ's easy yoke of obedience shall not remove from the yoke of punishment; they who, through pride, will not bow down their necks, but make them stiff, shall be bent low, that they go not upright or haughtily any more. <sup>19</sup> The Lord alone shall be exalted in that Day. For it is an evil time. Perhaps he gives a more special meaning to the words of Amos<sup>20</sup>, that a time of moral evil will be, or will end in, a time, full of evil, i. e. of sorest calamity.

4. In that day shall one take up a parable against you. The maskal or likeness may, in itself, be any speech in which one thing is likened to another; 1) "figured speech", 2) "proverb," and, since such proverbs were often sharp sayings against others, 3) "taunting figurative speech." But of the person himself it is always said, he is made, becomes a proverb<sup>21</sup>. To take up or utter such a speech against one, is, elsewhere, followed by the speech itself; <sup>22</sup> Thou shalt take up this parable against the king of Babylon, and say, &c. <sup>23</sup> Shall not all these take up a parable against him, and say, &c. Although then the name of the Jews has passed into a proverb of reproach<sup>24</sup>, this is not contained here. The parable here must be the same as the doleful lamentation, or dirge, which follows. No mockery is more cutting or fiendish, than to repeat in jest words by which one bemoans himself. The dirge which Israel should use of themselves in sorrow, the enemy shall take up in derision, as Satan does doubtless the self-condemnation of the damned. "Men do any evil, undergo any peril, to avoid shame. God brings before us that deepest and eternal shame," the shame and everlasting contempt, in presence of Himself and angels and devils and the good<sup>3</sup>, that we may avoid shame by avoiding evil.

And lament with a doleful lamentation. The words in Hebrew are varied inflections of a word imitating the sounds of woe. It is the voice of woe in all languages, because the voice of nature. Shall wail a wail of woe<sup>3</sup>, It is the funeral dirge over the dead<sup>4</sup>, or of the living doomed to die<sup>5</sup>; it is sometimes the measured mourning of those employed to call forth sorrow<sup>6</sup>, or mourning generally<sup>7</sup>. Among such elegies, are still Zion-songs<sup>8</sup>, (elegies over the ruin of Zion,) and mournings for the dead<sup>9</sup>. The word woe is thrice<sup>10</sup> repeated in Hebrew, in different forms, according to that solemn way, in which the extremest good or evil is spoken of; the threefold blessing, morning and evening, with the thrice-repeated name of God<sup>11</sup>, impressing upon them the mystery which developed itself, as the Divinity of the Messiah and the personal agency of the Holy Spirit were unfolded to them. The dirge which follows is purposely in abrupt brief words, as those in trouble speak, with scarce breath for utterance. First, in two words, with perhaps a softened inflection<sup>12</sup>, they express the utterness of their desolation. Then, in a threefold sentence, each clause consisting of three short words, they say what God had done, but name Him not, because they are angry with Him. God's chastisements irritate those whom they do not subdue<sup>13</sup>.

The portion of my people He changeth;

How removeth He (it) as to me!

To a rebel<sup>14</sup> our fields He divideth.

They act the patriot. They, the rich, mourn over "the portion of my people" (they say) which they had themselves despoiled: they speak, (as men do,) as if things were what they ought to be: they hold to the theory and ignore the facts. As if, because God had divided it to His people, therefore it so remained! as if, because the poor were in theory and by God's law provided for, they were so in fact! Then they are enraged at God's dealings. He removeth the portion as to me; and to whom giveth He our fields? To a rebel! the Assyrian, or the Chaldee. They had deprived the poor of their portion of the Lord's land<sup>15</sup>. And now they marvel that God resumes the possession of His own, and requires from them, not the fourfold<sup>16</sup> only of their spoil, but His whole heritage. Well might Assyrian or Chaldee, as they did, jeer at the word, renegade. They had not forsaken their gods;—but Israel, what was its whole history but a turning back? 17 Hath a nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? But My people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit.

Such was the meaning in their lips. The word divideth had the more bitterness, because it was the reversal of that first division at the entrance into Canaan. Then, with the use of this same word<sup>18</sup>, the division of the land of the heathen was appointed to them. Ezekiel, in his great symbolic vision, afterwards prophesied the restoration of Israel, with the use of this same term<sup>19</sup>. Joel spoke of the parting of their land, under this same term, as a sin of the heathen<sup>20</sup>. Now, they say, God divideth our fields, not to us, but to the Heathen, whose lands He gave us. It was a change of act: in impenitence, they think it a change of purpose or will. But what lies in that, we be utterly despoiled? Despoiled of everything; of what they felt, temporal things; and of what they did not feel, spiritual things. Despoiled of the land of promise, the good things of this life, but also of the Presence of God in His Temple, the grace of the Lord, the image of God and everlasting glory. Their portion was changed, as to themselves and with others. As to themselves, riches, honor, pleasure, their own land, were changed into want, disgrace, suffering, captivity; and yet more bitter was it to see others gain what they by their own fault had forfeited. As time went on, and their transgression deepened, the exchange of the portion of that former people of God became more complete. The casting-off of the Jews was the grafting-in of the Gentiles. 21 Seeing ye judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo! we turn to the Gentiles. And so they who were<sup>22</sup> no people, became the people of God, and they who were His people, became, for the time,<sup>23</sup> not My people: and<sup>24</sup> the adoption of sons, and the glory, and the covenants, and the lawgiving, and the service of God, and the promises, came to us Gentiles, since to us Christ Himself our God blessed for ever came, and made us His.

How hath He removed. The words do not say what He removed. They thought of His gifts, the words include Himself<sup>25</sup>. They say How! in amazement. The change is so great and bitter, it cannot be said. Time, yea eternity cannot utter it. He hath divided our fields. The land was but the outward symbol of the inward heritage. Unjust gain, kept back, is restored with usury; 26 it taketh away the life of the owners thereof. The vineyard whereof the Jews said, the inheritance shall be ours, was taken from them and given to others, even to Christians. So now is that awful change begun, when Christians, leaving God, their only unchanging Good, turn to earthly vanities, and, for the grace of God which He withdraws, have these only for their fleeting portion, until it shall be finally exchanged in the Day of Judgment. 27 Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted and thou art tormented.

Israel defended himself in impenitence and self-righteousness. He was already the Pharisee. The doom of such was hopeless. The prophet breaks in with a renewed, Therefore.

that prophecy: they shall not prophesy to them, that they shall not take shame.

He had already prophesied that they should lose the lands which they had unjustly gotten, the land which they had profaned. He had described it in their own impenitent words. Now on the impenitence he pronounces the judgment which impenitence entails, that they should not be restored.

5. Therefore thou shalt have none that shall cast a cord by lot in the congregation of the Lord. Thou, in the first instance, is the impenitent Jew of that day. God had promised by Hosea<sup>1</sup> to restore Judah; shortly after, the Prophet himself foretells it<sup>2</sup>. Now he forewarns these and such as these, that they would have no portion in it. They had<sup>3</sup> neither part nor lot in this matter. They, the not-Israel then, were the images and ensamples of the not-Israel afterwards, those who seem to be God's people and are not; members of the body, not of the soul of the Church; who have a sort of faith, but have not love. Such was afterwards the Israel after the flesh, which was broken off, while the true Israel was restored, passing out of themselves into Christ. Such, at the end, shall be those, who, being admitted by Christ into their portion, renounce the world in word not in deed. Such shall have "no portion for ever in the congregation of the Lord. For<sup>4</sup> nothing defiled shall enter there, nor whatsoever worketh abomination or a lie, but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life."

The ground of their condemnation is their resistance to light and known truth. These not only<sup>5</sup> entered not in, themselves, but, being hinderers of God's word, them that were entering in, they hindered.

6. Prophecy ye not, say they to them that prophecy; they shall not prophesy to them, that they shall not take shame. The words are very emphatic in Hebrew, from their briefness, Prophecy not; they shall indeed prophecy; they shall not prophesy to these; shame shall not depart<sup>7</sup>. The people, the false prophets, the politicians, forbade God and Micah to prophecy; Prophecy not. God, by Micah, recites their prohibition to themselves, and forewarns them of the consequences.

Prophecy ye not, lit. drop not. Amaziah and the God-opposing party had already given an ungodly meaning to the word<sup>8</sup>. 'Drop not,' 'distil not,' thus unceasingly, these same words, ever warning, ever telling of<sup>9</sup> lamentation and mourning and woe; prophesying not good concerning us, but evil<sup>10</sup>. So their descendants commanded the Apostles<sup>11</sup> not to speak at all or to teach in the Name of Jesus. <sup>12</sup> Did we not straitly command you, that ye should not teach in this Name? <sup>13</sup> This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against this holy place and the law. God answers; They shall certainly prophecy. The Hebrew word is emphatic<sup>14</sup>. The Prophets had their commission from God, and Him they must obey, whether Israel<sup>15</sup> would hear or whether they could forbear. So must Micah and Isaiah<sup>16</sup> now, or Jeremiah<sup>17</sup>, Ezekiel, and the rest afterwards. They shall not prophecy to these. He does not say only, They shall not prophecy to them, but, to these; i.e. they shall prophecy to others who would receive their words: God's word would not be stayed; they who would hearken shall never be deprived of their portion; but to these who despise, they shall not prophesy. It shall be all one, as though they did not prophesy; the soft rain shall not bedew them. The barn-floor shall be dry, while the fleece is moist<sup>18</sup>. So God says by Isaiah<sup>19</sup>; I will also command the clouds that they rain no rain upon it. The dew of God's word shall be transferred to others. But so shame [lit. shames<sup>20</sup>, manifold shame,] shall not depart, but shall rest upon them for ever. God would have turned away the shame from them; but they, despising His warnings, drew it to themselves. It was the natural fruit of their doings; it was in its natural home with them. God spake to them, that they might be freed from it. They silenced His Prophets; deafened themselves to His words; so it departed not. So our Lord says<sup>21</sup>, Now ye say, we see; therefore your sin remaineth; and S. John Baptist<sup>22</sup>, The wrath of God abideth on him. It hath not now first to come. It is not some new thing to be avoided, turned aside. The sinner has but to remain as he is; the shame encompasseth him already, and only departeth not. The wrath of God is already upon him, and abideth on him.

7. O thou that art named the house of Jacob; as Isaiah says<sup>23</sup>, Hear ye this, O house of Jacob, which are called by the name of Israel—which make mention of the God of Israel, not in truth, nor in righteousness. For they call themselves of the holy city, and stay themselves upon the God of Israel. They boasted of what convicted them of faithlessness. They relied on being what in spirit they had ceased to be, what in deeds they denied, children of a believing forefather. It is the same temper which we see more at large in their descendants; <sup>24</sup> We be Abraham's seed and were never in bondage to any man; how sayest Thou, ye shall be made free? <sup>25</sup> Abraham is our Father. It is the same which S. John Baptist and our Lord and S. Paul reproved. <sup>26</sup> Think not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham to our father. <sup>27</sup> If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham. Now ye seek to kill Me, a Man that hath told you the truth—This did not Abraham. <sup>28</sup> He is not a Jew which is one outwardly, neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh.—Behold thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law and makest thy boast of God, and knowest His Will and approvest the things that are more excellent—&c. The Prophet answers the unexpressed objections of those who forbade to prophecy evil. 'Such could not be of God,' these said; 'for God was pledged by His promises to the house of Jacob. It would imply change in God, if He were to cast off those whom He had chosen.' Micah answers; 'not God is changed, but you.' God's promise was to Jacob, not to those who were but named Jacob, who called themselves after the name of their father, but did not his deeds. The Spirit of the Lord was not straitened<sup>29</sup>, so that He was less long-suffering than 8 Even † of late my people is risen up as an enemy: ye pull off the robe † with the garment from them that pass by securely as men averse from war.

9 The || women of my people have ye cast out from their pleasant houses; from their children have ye taken away my glory for ever.

10 Arise ye, and depart; for this is not <sup>Deut. 12. 9.</sup> your <sup>Lev. 18. 25,</sup> rest: because it is <sup>Jer. 3. 2.</sup> polluted, it shall heretofore. These, which He threatened and of which they complained, were not His doings, not what He of His own Nature did, not what He loved to do, not His, as the Author or Cause of them, but theirs. God is Good, but to those who can receive good, the upright in heart<sup>1</sup>. God is only Loving unto Israel. He is all Love; nothing but<sup>2</sup> Love: all His ways are Love; but it follows, unto what Israel, the true Israel, the pure of heart.<sup>3</sup> All the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth; but to whom<sup>4</sup> unto such as keep His covenant and His testimonies. <sup>4</sup> The mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting; but unto them that fear Him. But, they becoming evil, His good became to them evil. Light, wholesome and gladdening to the healthful, hurts weak eyes. That which is straight cannot suit or fit with the crooked. Amend your crookedness, and God's ways will be straight to you. Do not My words do good? He doth speak<sup>5</sup> good words and comfortable words. They are not only good, but do good.<sup>6</sup> His word is with power. Still it is with those who walk uprightly; whether those who forsake not, or those who return to, the way of righteousness. God flattereth not, deceiveth not, promiseth not what He will not do. He cannot<sup>7</sup> speak peace where there is no peace. As He saith,<sup>8</sup> Behold the goodness and severity of God; on them which fell, severity, but towards thee, goodness, if thou continue in His goodness. God Himself could not make a heaven for the proud or envious. Heaven would be to them a hell.

8. Even of late [lit. yesterday<sup>9</sup>]. <sup>10</sup> He imputeth not past sins, but those recent and, as it were, of yesterday. My people is risen up vehemently<sup>11</sup>. God upbraideth them tenderly by the title, Mine own people, as S. John complaineth<sup>12</sup>, He came unto His own, and His own received Him not. God became not their enemy, but they arose as one man,—is risen up, the whole of it, as His. In Him they might have had peace and joy and assured gladness, but they arose in rebellion against Him, requiting Him evil for good, (as bad Christians do to Christ,) and brought war upon their own heads. This they did by their sins against their brethren. Casting off the love of man, they alienated themselves from the love of God.

Ye pull off [strip off violently<sup>13</sup>] the robe with the garment, lit. over against the cloak. The salmah<sup>14</sup> is the large enveloping cloak, which was worn loosely over the other dress, and served by night for a covering<sup>15</sup>. Eder<sup>16</sup>, translated robe, is probably not any one garment, but the remaining dress, the comely, becoming<sup>17</sup>, array of the person. These they stripped violently off from persons, peaceable, unoffending, off their guard, passing by securely, men averse from war<sup>18</sup> and strife. These they stripped of their raiment by day, leaving them half-naked, and of their covering for the night. So making war against God's peaceful people, they, as it were, made war against God.

9. The women of my people have ye cast out from their pleasant houses, [lit. from her pleasant house], each from her home. These were probably the widows of those whom they had stripped. Since the houses were their's, they were widows; and so their spoilers were at war with those whom God had committed to their special love, whom He had declared the objects of His own tender care, the widows and the fatherless. The widows they drove vehemently forth<sup>19</sup>, as having no portion in the inheritance which God had given them, as God had driven out their enemies before them, each from her pleasant house, the home where she had lived with her husband and children in delight and joy.

From [off] their [young<sup>20</sup>] children have ye taken away My glory. Primarily, the glory, comeliness, was the fitting apparel which God had given them<sup>21</sup>, and laid upon them<sup>22</sup>, and which these oppressors stripped off from them. But it includes all the gifts of God, wherewith God would array them. Instead of the holy home of parental care, the children grew up in want and neglect, away from all the ordinances of God, it may be, in a strange land. For ever. They never repented, never made restitution; but so they incurred the special woe of those who ill-used the unprotected, the widow, and the fatherless. The words for ever anticipate the punishment. The punishment is according to the sin. They never ceased their oppression. They, with the generation who should come after them, should be deprived of God's glory, and cast out of His land for ever.

10. Arise ye and depart. Go your way, as being cast out of God's care and land. It matters not whither they went. For this is not your rest. As ye have done, so shall it be done unto you. As ye cast out the widow and the fatherless, so shall ye be cast out; as ye gave no rest to those averse from war, so shall ye have none. <sup>23</sup> He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity; he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword. The land was given to them as a temporary rest, a symbol and earnest of the everlasting rest to the obedient. So Moses spake<sup>24</sup>, ye are not as yet come to the rest<sup>25</sup> and the inheritance which the Lord your God giveth you. But when ye go over Jordan, and dwell in the land which the Lord your God giveth you to inherit, and when He giveth you rest<sup>26</sup> from your enemies round about, so that ye dwell in safety &c. And Joshua<sup>27</sup>, Remember the word which Moses commanded you, saying, The Lord your God giveth you rest<sup>28</sup>. But the Psalmist had warned them, that, if they hardened their hearts like their forefathers, they too would not enter into His rest<sup>29</sup>.

should have been worn together with the <sup>17</sup> שָׁלוֹם. This meaning seems to be in the root; comp. שָׁלוֹם, array, apparel, dress. <sup>18</sup> שָׁנִי is doubtless an adjective form, distinct from the participle שָׁנִי (Is. lx. 20.) like שָׁנִי Jer. ii. 24. <sup>19</sup> וַתִּשְׁלַח is doubly intensive, as the intensive form with the emphatic ל. It is the word used of God's driving out the nations before Israel. (Ex. Jud. &c.) or of man being driven out of Paradise. (Gen. iii. 24.) Hagar being cast out. (Gen. xxi. 14.) The word itself, by its rough sound, expresses the more of harshness; and that as opposed to softness, וַתִּשְׁלַח. This is the same word as that rendered delicate, i. 16. <sup>20</sup> שָׁנִי <sup>21</sup> as Hos. ii. 8, רֵנִי I. H. Mich. <sup>22</sup> Ez. xvi. 14. לִד. <sup>23</sup> Rev. xiii. 10. <sup>24</sup> Deut. xii. 9. 10. add <sup>25</sup> וְנָחָה <sup>26</sup> וְנָחָה <sup>27</sup> וְנָחָה <sup>28</sup> וְנָחָה <sup>29</sup> Ps. xciv. 11. comp. לְמִנְחָה Ps. cxxxiii. 8. וְנָחָה 14.

Luke iv. 32. <sup>7</sup> Jer. vi. 14. <sup>8</sup> Rom. xi. 22. <sup>9</sup> שָׁנִי is i. q. שָׁנִי, in Is. xxx. 33. <sup>10</sup> S. Jer. <sup>11</sup> קִם, in Isaiah (xliv. 26. lviii. 12. lxi. 4.) transitive, but only of the raising up, rebuilding of ruins. The use of קִם actively in that one sense is no ground for taking it so, where the idea is different. To raise up an adversary is expressed by קִם Mic. v. 4. Am. vii. 14. 1 Kings xi. 14. and so raising up evil also. <sup>12</sup> 1. 11. <sup>13</sup> וַתִּשְׁלַח. This is intensive, as in Arabic. <sup>14</sup> שָׁלוֹם here and Ex. xxii. 8. i. q. שָׁלוֹם, elsewhere. <sup>15</sup> Deut. xxii. 17. <sup>16</sup> שָׁלוֹם occurs here only. There is no ground to identify it with the well-known שָׁלוֹם. It is not likely that the common garment should have been called, this once, by a different name; nor that the שָׁלוֹם, a wide enveloping garment, (see on Jonah iii. 6. p. 279. n. 9.)

destroy you, even with a sore destruction.
11 If a man || ° walking in the spirit and falsehood do lie, saying, I will prophesy
° Ezek. 13. 3.

Because it is polluted [lit. because of its pollution<sup>1</sup>] by idolatry, by violence, by uncleanness. So Moses (using the same word) says, the land is defiled<sup>2</sup> by the abominations of the heathen; and warns them, that the land spue you not out, when you defile it, as it spued out the nations which were before you. Ezekiel speaks of that defilement<sup>3</sup>, as the ground why God expelled Israel<sup>4</sup>. It shall destroy you, even with a sore [lit. sharp] destruction<sup>5</sup>. It is a sore thing to abuse the creatures of God to sin, and it is unfit that we should use what we have abused. Hence Holy Scripture speaks, as though even the inanimate creation took part with God, made subject to vanity, not willingly, and could not endure those who employed it against His Will.

The words, Arise, depart ye, for this is not your rest, became a sort of sacred proverb, spoken anew to the soul, whenever it would find rest out of God. "We are bidden to think of no rest for ourselves in any things of the world; but, as it were, arising from the dead, to stretch upwards, and walk after the Lord our God, and say, My soul cleaveth hard after Thee. This if we neglect, and will not hear Him Who saith, Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light, we shall indeed slumber, but shall be deceived and shall not find rest; for where Christ enlighteneth not the risen soul, what seemeth to be rest, is trouble." All rest is wearisome which is not in Thee, O our God.

11. If a man walking in the spirit and falsehood, lit. in spirit [not My Spirit] and falsehood, i. e. in a lying spirit; such as they, whose woe Ezekiel pronounces<sup>7</sup>, Woe unto the foolish prophets who walk after their own spirit and what they have not seen<sup>8</sup>; prophets out of their own hearts, who<sup>9</sup> prophesied a vision of falsehood, and a destruction and nothingness<sup>10</sup>; prophesied falsehood; yea, prophets of the deceit of their hearts. These, like the true prophets, walked in spirit; as Isaiah speaks of walking in righteousness<sup>11</sup>, and Solomon of one walking in the frowardness of the mouth<sup>12</sup>. Their habitual converse was in a spirit, but of falsehood. If such an one do lie, saying, I will prophesy unto thee of wine and strong drink. Man's conscience must needs have some plea in speaking falsely of God. The false prophets had to please the rich men, to embolden them in their self-indulgence, to tell them that God would not punish. They doubtless spoke of God's temporal promises to His people, the land flowing with milk and honey, His promises of abundant harvest and vintage, and assured them, that God would not withdraw these, that He was not so precise about His law. Micah tells them in plain words, what it all came to; it was a prophesying of wine and strong drink.

He shall even be the prophet of this people, lit. and shall be bedewing this people. He uses the same words, which scorers of Israel and Judah employed in forbidding to prophesy. They said, drop not; forbidding God's word as a wearisome dropping. It wore away their patience, not their hearts of stone. He tells them, who might speak to them without wearying, of whose words they would never tire, who might do unto thee of wine and of strong drink; he shall even be the prophet of this people.

12 ¶ I will surely assemble, O Jacob, ¶ ch. 4. 6, 7.

habitually<sup>13</sup> what they forbade to God,—one who, in the Name of God, set them at ease in their sensual indulgences. This is the secret of the success of every thing opposed to God and Christ. Man wants a God. God has made it a necessity of our nature to crave after Him. Spiritual, like natural, hunger, debarred from or loathing wholesome food, must be stilled, stifled, with what will appease its gnawings. Our natural intellect longs for Him; for it cannot understand itself without Him. Our restlessness longs for Him; to rest upon. Our helplessness longs for Him, to escape from the unbearable pressure of our unknown futurity. Our imagination craves for Him; for, being made for the Infinite, it cannot be content with the finite. Aching affections long for Him; for no creature can soothe them. Our dissatisfied conscience longs for Him, to teach it and make it one with itself. But man does not want to be responsible, nor to owe duty; still less to be liable to penalties for disobeying. The Christian, not the natural man, longs that his whole being should tend to God. The natural man wishes to be well-rid of what sets him ill at ease, not to belong to God. And the horrible subtlety of false teaching, in each age or country, is to meet its own favourite requirements, without calling for self-sacrifice or self-oblation, to give it a god, such as it would have, such as might content it. "The people willeth to be deceived, be it deceived," is a true proverb. Men turn away their ears from the truth<sup>14</sup> which they dislike; and so are turned unto fables which they like. They who receive not the love of the truth,—believe a lie<sup>15</sup>. If men will not retain God in their knowledge, God giveth them over to an undistinguishing mind<sup>16</sup>. They who would not receive our Lord, coming in His Father's Name, have ever since, as He said, received them who came in their own<sup>17</sup>. Men teach their teachers how they wish to be mistaught, and receive the echo of their wishes as the Voice of God.

12. I will surely assemble, O Jacob, all of thee; I will surely gather the remnant of Israel. God's mercy on the penitent and believing being the end of all His threatenings, the mention of it often bursts in abruptly. Christ is ever the Hope as the End of prophecy, ever before the Prophets' mind. The earthquake and fire precede the still small voice of peace in Him. What seems then sudden to us, is connected in truth. The Prophet had said<sup>18</sup>, where was not their rest and how they should be cast forth; he saith at once how they should be gathered to their everlasting rest. He had said, what promises of the false prophets would not be fulfilled<sup>19</sup>. But, despair being the most deadly enemy of the soul, he does not take away their false hopes, without shewing them the true mercies in store for them. "Think not," he would say, "that I am only a prophet of ill. The captivity foretold will indeed now come, and God's mercies will also come, although not in the way, which these speak of." The false prophets spoke of worldly abundance ministering to sensuality, and of unbroken security. He tells of God's mercies, but after chastisement, to the remnant of Israel. But the restoration is complete, far beyond

Mel. have understood it of travail-pains, (Cant. viii. 5. Ps. vii. 15.) but this would have the opposite sense of bringing forth, re-birth, not of ejection. (See Is. lxvi. 8.) The sharp bitter pang would express the pains of travail, not its fruitlessness or that they were cast out any whither. Fruitlessness of travail-pangs is expressed, if intended, (as in Is. xxvi. 18.)

he gathered shall be too narrow to contain them as is said in Isaiah ; Give place to me, that I may

They shall make great noise (it is the same word as our hum, "the hum of men,") by reason of the multitude of men. He explains his image, as does Ezekiel <sup>26</sup>, And ye are My flock, the flock of My pasture ; men are ye ; I, your God, saith the Lord God : and, <sup>27</sup> As a flock of holy things, as the flock of Jerusalem in her solemn feasts ; so shall the waste cities be full of a flock of men, and they shall know that I am the Lord. So many shall they be, that " throughout the whole world they shall make a great and public sound in praising God, filling Heaven and the green pastures of Paradise with a mighty hum of praise ; " as St. John saw <sup>28</sup> a great multitude which no man could number, " <sup>24</sup> with one united voice praising the Good Shepherd, Who smoothed for them all rugged places, and evened them by His Own Steps, Himself the Guide of their way and the Gate of Paradise, as He saith, I am the Door ; through Whom, bursting through and going before, being also the Door of the way, the flock of believers shall break through It. But this Shepherd is their Lord and King." Not their King only, but the Lord God ; so that this, too, bears witness that Christ is God.

13. The Breaker is come up (gone up) before them ; they have broken up, (broken through<sup>29</sup>) and have passed the gate, and have gone forth. The image is not of conquest, but of deliverance. They break through, not to enter in but to pass through the gate and go forth. The wall of the city is ordinarily broken through, in order to make an entrance<sup>30</sup>, or to secure to a conqueror the power of entering in<sup>31</sup> at any time, or by age and decay<sup>32</sup>. But here the object is expressed, to go forth. Plainly then they were confined before, as in a prison ; and the gate of the prison was burst open, to set them free. It is then the same image as when God says by Isaiah<sup>33</sup> ; I will say to the North, give up ; and to the South, Hold not back, or<sup>34</sup>, Go ye forth of Babylon, Say ye, the Lord hath redeemed His servant Jacob ; or, with the same reminiscence of God's visible leading of His people out of Egypt,<sup>35</sup> Depart ye, depart ye ; for ye shall not go out with haste, nor yet by flight, for the Lord God shall go before you, and the God of Israel will be your rereward ; or as Hosea describes their restoration<sup>36</sup> ; Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together and appoint themselves one Head, and they shall go up out of the land<sup>37</sup>. Elsewhere, in Isaiah, the spiritual meaning of the deliverance from the prison is more distinctly brought out, as the work of our Redeemer<sup>38</sup>. I will give Thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles, to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, them that sit in darkness out of the prison-house; and<sup>1</sup> the Spirit of the Lord Gad is upon Me, because the Lord hath anointed Me to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound.

From this passage, the "Breaker-through" was one of the titles of the Christ, known to the Jews<sup>2</sup>, as One Who should be "from below and from above" also; and from it they believed that "captives should come up from Gehenna, and the Shechinah," or the Presence of God, "at their head."<sup>3</sup> "He then, Who shall break the way, the King and Lord Who shall go up before them, shall be the Good Shepherd, Who puts them together in the fold. And this He doth when, as He saith, He putteth forth His own sheep, and He goeth before them, and the sheep follow Him, for they know His Voice. How doth He go before them but by suffering for them, leaving them an example of suffering, and opening the entrance of Paradise? The Good Shepherd goeth up to the Cross, <sup>4</sup> and is lifted up from the earth, laying down His Life for His sheep, to draw all men unto Him. He goeth up, trampling on death by His Resurrection; He goeth up above the heaven of heavens, and sitteth on the Right Hand of the Father, opening the way before them, so that the flock, in their lowliness, may arrive where the Shepherd went before in His Majesty. And when He thus breaketh through and openeth the road, they also break through and pass through the gate and go out by it, by that Gate, namely, whereof the Psalmist saith<sup>5</sup>, This is the Gate of the Lord; the righteous shall enter into It. What other is this Gate than that same Passion of Christ, beside which there is no gate, no way whereby any can enter into life? Through that open portal, which the lance of the soldier made in His Side when crucified, and there came thereout Blood and Water, they shall pass and go through, even as the children of Israel passed through the Red Sea, which divided before them, when Pharaoh, his chariots and horsemen, were drowned."<sup>6</sup> "He will be in their hearts, and will teach and lead them; He will shew them the way of salvation,<sup>7</sup> guiding their feet into the way of peace, and they shall pass through the strait and narrow gate which leadeth unto life; of which it is written<sup>8</sup>, Enter ye in at the strait gate; because strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it. And their King shall pass before them, as He did, of old, in the figure of the cloud, of which Moses said<sup>9</sup>, If Thy Presence go not, carry us not up hence; and wherein shall it be known that I have found grace in Thy sight, I and Thy people, is it not in that Thou goest up with us? and as He then did when He passed out of this world to the Father. And the Lord on (that is, at) the head of them, as of His army. "For the Lord is His Name, and He is the Head, they the members; He the King, they the people; He the Shepherd, they the sheep of His pasture. And of this passing through He spake<sup>10</sup>, By Me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out and find pasture. For a man entereth in, when, receiving the faith, he becomes a sheep of this Shepherd, and goeth out, when he closeth this present life, and then findeth the pastures of unfading, everlasting life;"<sup>12</sup> "passing from this pilgrimage to his home, from faith to sight, from labour to reward." Again, as describing the Christian's life here, it speaks of progress. "Whoso shall have entered in, must not remain in the state wherein he entered, but must go forth into the pasture; so that, in entering in should be the beginning, in going forth and finding pasture, the perfecting of graces. He who entereth in, is contained within the bounds of the world; he who goeth forth, goes, as it were, beyond all created things, and, counting as nothing all things seen, shall find pasture above the Heavens, and shall feed upon the Word of God, and say<sup>13</sup>, The Lord is my Shepherd, (and feedeth me,) I can lack nothing. But this going forth can only be through Christ; as it followeth, and the Lord at the head of them." Nor, again, is this in itself easy, or done for us without any effort of our own. All is of Christ. The words express the closeness of the relation between the Head and the members; and what He, our King and Lord, doth, they do, because He Who did it for them, doth it in them. The same words are used of both, shewing that what they do, they do by virtue of His Might, treading in His steps, walking where He has made the way plain, and by His Spirit. What they do, they do, as belonging to Him. He breaketh through, or, rather, in all is the Breaker-through. They, having broken through, pass on, because He passeth before them. He will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron. He breaketh through whatever would hold us back or oppose us, all might of sin and death and Satan, as Moses opened the Red Sea, for <sup>14</sup> a way for the ransomed to pass over; and so He saith, I will go before thee, I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron, and I will give thee the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places. So then Christians, following Him, the Captain of their salvation, strengthened by His grace, must burst the bars of the flesh and of the world, the chains and bonds of evil passions and habits, force themselves through the narrow way and narrow gate, do violence to themselves,<sup>15</sup> endure hardness, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. The title of our Lord, the Breaker-through<sup>16</sup>, and the saying, they break through, together express the same as the New Testament doth in regard to our being partakers of the sufferings of Christ. <sup>17</sup> Joint heirs with Christ, if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may be also glorified together. <sup>18</sup> If we be dead with Him, we shall also live with Him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with Him. <sup>19</sup> Forasmuch then as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh—arm yourselves likewise with the same mind.

The words may include also the removal of the souls of the just, who had believed in Christ before His Coming, into Heaven after His Resurrection, and will be fully completed when, in the end, He shall cause His faithful servants, in body and soul, to enter into the joy of their Lord.

gather them into one fold under One Shepherd, guard them, lead them, remove all difficulties before them, be Himself their Head and enable them to follow Him. He turns then to them. These are God's doings ; this, God has in store for you hereafter. Even when mercy itself shall require chastisement, He doth not cast off for ever. The desolation is but the forerunner of future mercy. What then do ye ? The Prophet appeals to them, class by class. There was one general corruption of every order of men, through whom Judah could be preserved, princes<sup>1</sup>, prophets<sup>2</sup>, priests<sup>3</sup>. The salt had lost its savour ; wherewith could it be seasoned ? whereby could the decaying mass of the people be kept from entire corruption ?

Hear, I pray you, O heads of Jacob, and ye princes of the house of Israel. He arraigns them by the same name, under which He had first promised mercy. He had first promised mercy to all Jacob and the remnant of Israel. So now he upbraids the heads of Jacob, and the princes of the house of Israel, lest they should deceive themselves. At the same time he recalls them to the deeds of their father. Judah had succeeded to the birthright, forfeited by Reuben, Simeon and Levi ; and in Judah all the promises of the Messiah were laid up. But he was not like the three great Patriarchs, the father of the faithful, or the meek Isaac, or the much-tried Jacob. The name then had not the reminiscences, or force of appeal, contained in the titles, seed of Abraham, or Isaac, or Israel.

Is it not for you to know judgment ? It is a great increase of guilt, when persons neglect or pervert what it is their special duty and office to guard ; as when teachers corrupt doctrine, or preachers give in to a low standard of morals, or judges pervert judgment. The princes here spoken of are so named from judging, "deciding"<sup>4</sup> causes. They are the same as the rulers, whom Isaiah at the same time upbraids, as being, from their sins, rulers of Sodom<sup>5</sup>, whose <sup>6</sup> hands were full of blood. They who do not right, in time cease, in great measure, to know it. As God withdraws His grace, the mind is darkened and can no longer see it. So it is said of Eli's sons, they <sup>7</sup> were sons of Belial, they knew not the Lord ; and, <sup>8</sup> Into a malicious soul Wisdom shall not enter, nor dwell in a body that is subject unto sin. Such <sup>9</sup> "attain not to know the judgments of God which are a great deep : and the depth of His justice the evil mind findeth not." But if men will not know judgment by doing it, they shall by suffering it.

2. Who hate the good and love the evil ; i. e. they hate, for its own sake, that which is good, and love that which is evil. The Prophet is not here speaking of their hating good men, or loving evil men, but of their hating goodness and loving wickedness<sup>10</sup>. <sup>11</sup> "It is sin not to love good ; what guilt to hate it ! it is faulty, not to flee from evil, what ungodliness to love it !" Man, at first, loves and admires the good, even while he doth it not ; he hates the evil, even while he does it, or as soon as he has done it. But man cannot bear to be at strife with his conscience, and so he ends it, by excusing himself and telling lies to himself. And then, he hates the truth or good with a bitter hatred, because it disturbs the darkness of the false peace with which he would envelope himself. At first, men love only the pleasure connected with the evil ; then they make whom they can, evil, because goodness is a reproach to them : in the end, they love evil for its own sake<sup>11</sup>. Heathen morality too distinguished between the incontinent and the unprincipled<sup>12</sup>, the man who sinned under force of temptation, and the man who had lost the sense of right and wrong. <sup>13</sup> Every one that doeth evil, hateth the light. Whoso longeth for things unlawful, hateth the righteousness which rebuketh and punisheth<sup>14</sup>.

Who pluck off their skin from off them, and their flesh from off their bones. He had described the Good Shepherd ; now, in contrast, he describes those who ought to be "shepherds of the people," to feed, guard, direct them, but who were their butchers ; who did not shear them, but flayed them ; who fed on them, not fed them. He heaps up their guilt, act by act. First they flay, i. e. take away their outer goods ; then they break their bones in pieces, the most solid parts, on which the whole frame of their body depends, to get at the very marrow of their life, and so feed themselves upon them. And not unlike, though still more fearfully, do they sin, who first remove the skin, as it were, or outward tender fences of God's graces ; (such as is modesty, in regard to inward purity ; outward demeanour, of inward virtue ; outward forms, of inward devotion ; ) and so break the strong bones of the sterner virtues, which hold the whole soul together ; and with them the whole flesh, or softer graces, becomes one shapeless mass, shred to pieces and consumed. So Ezekiel says<sup>15</sup> ; Woe to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves ; should not the shepherds feed the flock ? Ye eat the fat and ye clothe you with the wool, ye kill them that are fed, ye feed not the flock. The diseased have ye not strengthened, &c.

4. Then shall they cry unto the Lord. Then. The Prophet looks on to the Day of the Lord, which is ever before his mind. So the Psalmist, speaking of a time or place not expressed, says, <sup>16</sup> There were they in great fear. He sees it, points to it, as seeing what those to whom he spoke, saw not, and the more awfully, because he saw, with super-human and so with certain vision, what was hid from their eyes. The then was not then, in the time of grace, but when the Day of grace should be over, and the Day of Judgment should be come. So of that day, when judgment should set in, God says in Jeremiah<sup>17</sup>, Behold I will bring evil upon them which they shall not be able to go forth of, and they will cry unto Me, and I will not hearken unto them. And David<sup>18</sup>, They cried and there was none to save ; unto the Lord, and He answered them not. And Solomon<sup>19</sup> ; Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he shall cry himself and shall not be heard. And St. James<sup>20</sup>, He shall have judgment without mercy, that hath shewed no mercy. The prayer is never too late, until judgment comes<sup>21</sup> ; the day of grace is over, when the time of judgment has arrived. "They shall cry unto the Lord, and shall not be heard, because they too did not hear those who asked them, and the Lord shall turn His Face from them, because they too turned their face from those who prayed them."

He will even hide His Face. He will not look in mercy on those who would not receive His look of grace. Your sins, He says by Isaiah, have hid His face from you, that He hear-eth not. O what will that turning away of the Face be, on which hangs eternity!

As. There is a proportion between the sin and the punishment. <sup>1</sup> As I have done, so God hath requited me. They have behaved themselves ill in their doings, lit. have made their deeds evil. The word rendered doings is almost always used in a bad sense, mighty deeds, and so deeds with a high hand. Not ignorantly or negligently, nor through human frailty, but with set purpose they applied themselves, not to amend but to corrupt their doings, and make them worse. God called to them by all His prophets, make good your doings<sup>2</sup>; and they, reversing it, used diligence to make their doings evil. <sup>3</sup> All this they shall suffer, because they were not rulers, but tyrants; not Prefects, but lions; not masters of disciples, but wolves of sheep; and they sated themselves with flesh and were fattened, and, as sacrifices for the slaughter, were made ready for the punishment of the Lord. Thus far against evil rulers; then he turns to the false prophets and evil teachers, who by flatteries subvert the people of God, promising them the knowledge of His word."

5. The prophets that make My people err, flattering them in their sins and rebellions, promising that they shall go unpunished, that God is not so strict, will not put in force the judgments He threatens. So Isaiah saith<sup>4</sup>; O my people, they which lead thee, mislead thee; and<sup>5</sup>, the leaders of this people are its misleaders, and they that are led of them are destroyed. And Jeremiah<sup>6</sup>, The prophets have seen for thee vanity and folly; and they have not discovered thine iniquity to turn away thy captivity, and have seen for thee false burdens and causes of banishment. No error is hopeless, save what is taught in the Name of God.

That bite with their mouths. The word<sup>7</sup> is used of no other biting than the biting of serpents. They were doing real, secret evil while they cry, i. e. proclaim peace; they bit, as serpents, treacherously, deadlily. They fed, not so much on the gifts, for which they hired themselves to<sup>8</sup> speaking peace when there was no peace, as on the souls of the givers. So God says by Ezekiel<sup>9</sup>, Will ye pollute Me among My people for handfuls of barley and for pieces of bread, to slay the souls that should not die, and to save the souls alive that should not live, by your lying to My people that hear your lies? Because with lies ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad; and strengthened the hands of the wicked, that he should not return from his wicked way, by promising him life—therefore ye shall see no more vanity nor divine divinations. It was with a show of peace that Joab slew Abner and Amasa, and with a kiss of peace Judas betrayed our Lord.

refused, war proclaimed,) they sanctify war against him. Like those of whom Joel prophesied<sup>10</sup>, they proclaim war against him in the Name of God, by the authority of God which they had taken to themselves, speaking in His Name Who had not sent them. So when our Lord fed the multitude, they would take Him by force and make Him a king; when their hopes were gone and they saw that His Kingdom was not of this world, they said, Crucify Him, crucify Him. Much more the Pharisees, who, because He rebuked their covetousness, their devouring widows' houses, their extortion and excess, their making their proselytes more children of hell than themselves, said, Thou blasphemest. So, when the masters of the possessed damsel whom St. Paul freed, <sup>11</sup> saw that the hope of their gains was gone, they accused him, that he exceedingly troubled their city, teaching customs not lawful to be received. So Christians were persecuted by the Heathen as <sup>12</sup> "hating the human race," because they would not partake of their sins; as <sup>13</sup> "atheists," because they worshipped not their gods; as <sup>14</sup> "disloyal" and "public enemies," because they joined not in unholy festivals; as "unprofitable," because they neglected things not profitable but harmful. So men are now called "illiberal," who will not make free with the truth of God; "intolerant," who will not allow that all faith is matter of opinion, and that there is no certain truth; "precise," "censorious," who will not connive at sin, or allow the levity which plays, mothlike, around it and jests at it. The Church and the Gospel are against the world, and so the world which they condemn must be against them; and such is the force of truth and holiness, that it must carry on the war against them in their own name.

6. Therefore night shall be unto you, that ye shall not have a vision. In the presence of God's extreme judgments, even deceivers are at length still; silenced at last by the common misery, if not by awe. The false prophets had promised peace, light, brightness, prosperity; the night of trouble, anguish, darkness, fear, shall come upon them. So shall they no more dare to speak in the Name of God, while He was by His judgments speaking the contrary in a way which all must hear. They abused God's gifts and long-suffering against Himself: they could misinterpret His long-suffering into favor, and they did it: their visions of the future were but the reflections of the present and its continuance; they thought that because God was enduring, He was indifferent, and they took His government out of His Hands, and said; that what He appeared to be now, He would ever be. They had no other light, no other foresight. When then the darkness of temporal calamity enveloped them, it shrouded in one common darkness of night all present brightness and all sight of the future.

<sup>15</sup> After Caiaphas had in heart spoken falsehood and a prophecy of blood, although God overruled it to truth which he meant not, all grace of prophecy departed. <sup>16</sup> The law and the prophets prophesied until John. The Sun of Righteousness went down over them, inwardly and outwardly, withdrawing the brightness of His Providence and the inward light of

So Christ Himself forewarned; <sup>1</sup> Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you. And so it has remained ever since. <sup>2</sup> The veil has been on their hearts. The light is in all the world, but they see it not; it arose to lighten the Gentiles, but they walk on still in darkness. As opposed to holiness, truth, knowledge, Divine enlightening of the mind, bright gladness, contrariwise darkness is falsehood, sin, error, blindness of soul, ignorance of Divine things, and sorrow. In all these ways, did the Sun go down over them, so that the darkness weighed heavily upon them. So too the inventors of heresies pretend to see and to enter into the mysteries of Christ, yet find darkness instead of light, lose even what they think they see, fail even of what truth they seem most to hold; and they shall be in night and darkness, being cast into outer darkness; <sup>3</sup> sinning against the brethren, and wounding the weak conscience of those for whom Christ died.

7. They shall cover their lips, lit. the hair of the upper lip<sup>4</sup>. This was an action enjoined on lepers<sup>5</sup>, and a token of mourning<sup>6</sup>; a token then of sorrow and uncleanness. With their lips they had lied, and now they should cover their lips, as men dumb and ashamed. For there is no answer of God, as these deceivers had pretended to have. When all things shall come contrary to what they had promised, it shall be clear that God did not send them. And having plainly no answer of God, they shall not dare to feign one then. <sup>7</sup> Then not even the devils shall receive power to deceive them by their craft. The oracles shall be dumb; the unclean spirit shall not dare to delude." <sup>8</sup> All this is spoken against those who, in the Church of Christ, flatter the rich, or speak as men-pleasers, out of avarice, ambition, or any like longing for temporal good, to whom that of Isaiah<sup>9</sup> fitteth; the leaders of this people [they who profess to lead them aright] mislead them, and they that are led of them are destroyed.

8. And truly I, [lit. contrariwise I,] i. e. whereas they shall be void and no word in them, I am full of (or filled with) power by the Spirit of the Lord and of judgment and might. The false prophets<sup>10</sup> walked after their own spirit. Their only power or influence was from without, from favouring circumstances, from adapting themselves to the great or to the people, going along with the tide, and impelling persons whither they wished to go. The power of the true prophet was inherent, and that by gift of the Spirit of the Lord<sup>11</sup>. And so, while adverse circumstances silenced the false prophets, they called forth the more the energy of the true, whose power was from Him in Whose Hands the world is. The adverse circumstances to the false prophets were God's judgments; to the true, they were man's refractoriness, rebellion, oppressiveness. Now was the time of the false prophets; now, at a distance, they could foretell hardily, because they could not yet be convicted of untruth. When trouble came, they went into the inner chamber to hide<sup>12</sup> themselves. Micah, amid the wild tumult of the people<sup>13</sup>, was fearless, upborne by Him who controls, stills, or looses it, to do His Sovereign Will.

I am filled with power. So our Lord bade His Apostles<sup>14</sup>, Tarry ye, until ye be endued with power from on high:<sup>15</sup> ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you; and<sup>16</sup> they were all filled with the Holy Ghost. The three gifts, power, judgment, might, are the fruits of the One Spirit of God, through Whom the Prophet was filled with them. Of these, power is always strength residing in the person, whether it be the power<sup>17</sup> or might of wisdom<sup>18</sup> of Almighty God Himself, or power which He imparts<sup>19</sup> or implants<sup>20</sup>. But it is always power lodged in the person, to be put forth by him. Here, as in St. John Baptist<sup>21</sup> or the Apostles<sup>14</sup>, it is Divine power, given through God the Holy Ghost, to accomplish that for which he was sent, as St. Paul was endued with might<sup>22</sup>, casting down imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ. It is just that, which is so wanting to human words, which is so characteristic of the word of God, power. Judgment is, from its form<sup>23</sup>, not so much discernment in the human being, as "the thing judged," pronounced by God, the righteous judgment of God, and righteous judgment in man conformably therewith<sup>24</sup>. It was what, he goes on to say, the great men of his people abhorred<sup>25</sup>, equity. With this he was filled. This was the substance of his message, right judgment to be enacted by them, to which he was to exhort them, or which, on their refusal, was to be pronounced upon them in the Name of God the Judge of all, and to be executed upon them. Might is courage or boldness to deliver the message of God, not awed or hindered by any adversaries. It is that holy courage, of which St. Paul speaks<sup>26</sup>, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel, for which I am an ambassador in bonds, that therein I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak. So too, after the Apostles had been<sup>27</sup> straitly threatened that they should speak no more in the Name of Jesus, all, having prayed, were filled with the Holy Ghost, and spake the word of God with boldness. <sup>28</sup> Whoso is so strengthened and arrayed, uttereth fiery words, whereby hearers' hearts are moved and changed. But whoso speaketh of his own mind, doth good neither to himself nor others."

So then, of the three gifts, power expresses the Divine might lodged in him; judgment, the substance of what he had to deliver; might or courage, the strength to deliver it in face of human power, persecution, ridicule, death.

<sup>29</sup> These gifts the Prophets know are not their own, but are from the Spirit of God, and are by Him inspired into them. Such was the spirit of Elijah, unconquered, energetic, fiery, of whom it is said, <sup>30</sup> Then stood up Elias as fire, and his word burned like a lamp. Such was Isaiah<sup>31</sup>, Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and shew My people their transgression and the house of Jacob their sins. Such was Jeremiah<sup>1</sup>; Therefore I am full of the fury of the Lord; I am weary of holding in. I have set thee for a trier among My people, a strong fort; and thou shalt know and try their ways. Such was John Baptist, who said,<sup>2</sup> O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Such was Paul, who, when he<sup>3</sup> reasoned of temperance, righteousness and judgment to come, made Felix tremble, though unbelieving and ungodly. Such were the Apostles, who, when they had received the Holy Spirit,<sup>4</sup> brake, with a mighty breath, ships and kings of Tarshish. Such will be Elias and Enoch at the end of the world, striving against Anti-Christ, of whom it is said<sup>5</sup>, If any man will hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth and devoureth their enemies."

9. Hear this, I pray you. The Prophet discharges upon them that judgment, whereof, by the Spirit of God, he was full, and which they abhorred; judgment against their perversion of judgment. He rebukes the same classes as before<sup>6</sup>, the heads and judges, yet still more sternly. They abhorred judgment, he says, as a thing loathsome and abominable<sup>7</sup>, such as men cannot bear even to look upon; they not only dealt wrongly, but they perverted, distorted, all equity: "that so there should not remain even some slight justice in the city." All equity; all of every sort, right, rectitude, uprightness, straight-forwardness<sup>8</sup>, whatever was right by natural conscience or by God's law, they distorted, like the sophists making the worse appear the better cause. Naked violence crushes the individual; perversion of equity destroys the fountain-head of justice. The Prophet turns from them in these words, as one who could not bear to look upon their misdeeds, and who would not speak to them; they pervert; building; her heads, her priests, her prophets; as Elisha, but for the presence of Jehoshaphat, would not look on Jehoram, nor see him<sup>10</sup>. He first turns and speaks of them, as one man, as if they were all one in evil;

10 They build up [lit. building, sing.] Zion with blood. This may be taken literally on both sides, that, the rich built their palaces, "with wealth gotten by bloodshed<sup>9</sup>, by rapine of the poor, by slaughter of the saints," as Ezekiel says<sup>11</sup>, her princes in the midst thereof are like wolves, to shed blood, to destroy souls, to get dishonest gain. Or by blood he may mean that they indirectly took away life, in that, through wrong judgments, extortion, usury, fraud, oppression, reducing wages or detaining them, they took away what was necessary to support life. So it is said<sup>12</sup>; The bread of the needy is their life, he that defraudeth him thereof is a man of blood. He that taketh away his neighbour's living slayeth him, and he that defraudeth the labourer of his hire is a bloodshedder. Or it may be, that as David prayed to God,<sup>13</sup> Build Thou the walls of Jerusalem, asking Him thereby to maintain or increase its well-being, so these men thought to promote the temporal prosperity of Jerusalem by doings which were unjust, oppresssive, crushing to their inferiors. So Solomon, in his degenerate days, made the yoke upon his people and his service grievous<sup>14</sup>. So ambitious monarchs by large standing-armies or filling their exchequers drain the life-blood of their people. The physical condition and stature of the poorer population in much of France was lowered permanently by the conscriptions under the first Emperor. In our wealthy nation, the term poverty describes a condition of other days. We have had to coin a new name to designate the misery, offspring of our material prosperity. From our wealthy towns, (as from those of Flanders,) ascends to heaven against us "the cry of 'pauperism' i.e. the cry of distress, arrived at a condition of system and of power, and, by an unexpected curse, issuing from the very development of wealth. The political economy of unbelief has been crushed by facts on all the theatres of human activity and industry." Truly we build up Zion with blood, when we cheapen luxuries and comforts at the price of souls, use Christian toil like brute strength, tempt men to dishonesty and women to other sin, to eke out the scanty wages which alone our selfish thirst for cheapness allows, heedless of every thing save of our individual gratification, or the commercial prosperity, which we have made our god. Most awfully was Zion built with blood, when the Jews shed the innocent Blood, that <sup>15</sup>the Romans might not take away their place and nation. But since He has said<sup>17</sup>, Inasmuch as ye did it not unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye did it not unto Me, and, <sup>18</sup>Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me? when Saul was persecuting Christ's members, then, in this waste of lives and of souls, we are not only wasting the Price of His Blood in ourselves and others, but are anew slaying Christ, and that, from the self-same motives as those who crucified Him. <sup>19</sup>When ye sin against the members, ye sin against Christ. Our commercial greatness is the price of His Blood<sup>20</sup>. In the judgments on the Jews, we may read our own national future; in the woe on those through whom the weak brother perishes for whom Christ died<sup>21</sup>, we, if we partake or connive at it, may read our own.

11. The heads thereof judge for reward. Every class was corrupted. One sin, the root of all evil<sup>22</sup>, covetousness, entered into all they did. It, not God, was their one end, and so their god. Her heads, the secular authority, who <sup>23</sup>sat to judge according to the law, judged, contrary to the law, for rewards. They sat as the representatives of the Majesty of God, in Whose Name they judged, Whose righteous Judgment and correcting Providence law exhibits and executes, and they profaned it. To judge for rewards was in itself sin, forbidden by the law<sup>24</sup>. To refuse justice, unless paid for it, was unjust, degrading to justice. The second sin followed hard upon it, to judge unjustly, absolving the guilty, condemning the innocent, justifying the oppressor, legalising wrong.

of the two "plains," Sharon, and Mishor in Reuben (Deut. iii. 10. iv. 43.) being formed from it. <sup>10</sup> 2 Kgs. iii. 14. <sup>11</sup> xxii. 27. <sup>12</sup> Eccles. xxxiv. 21, 22. <sup>13</sup> Ps. li. 18. <sup>14</sup> 1 Kgs. xii. 4. <sup>15</sup> Lacordaire, Conférences, T. ii. p. 300. <sup>16</sup> S. signed him by God, and, therewith, the duty to <sup>1</sup> put difference between holy and unholy, and between clean and unclean, and to teach all the statutes, which God had commanded. Their lips were to keep knowledge<sup>2</sup>. This then, which they were bound to give, they sold. But <sup>3</sup> whereas it is said to the holy, <sup>4</sup> Freely ye have received, freely give, these, producing the answer of God upon the receipt of money, sold the grace of the Lord for a covetous price.<sup>5</sup> Probably too, their sin co-operated with and strengthened the sin of the judges. Authorised interpreters of the law, they, to please the wealthy, probably misinterpreted the law. For wicked judges would not have given a price for a righteous interpretation of the law. The civil authorities were entrusted by God with power to execute the law; the priests were entrusted by Him with the knowledge to expound it. Both employed in its perversion that which God gave them for its maintenance. The princes obtained by bribery the misjudgment of the priests and enforced it; the priests justified the injustice of the Princes. So Arian Bishops, themselves hirelings<sup>6</sup>, by false expositions of Scripture, countenanced Arian Emperors in the oppression of the faithful. <sup>7</sup> "They propped up the heresy by human patronage;" the Emperors <sup>8</sup> "bestowed on" them their "reign of irreligion." The Arian Emperors tried to efface the Council of Nice by councils of Arian Bishops<sup>9</sup>. Emperors perverted their power, the Bishops their knowledge. Not publicly only but privately doubtless also, these priests taught falsely for hire, lulling the consciences of those who wished to deceive themselves as to what God forbade, and to obtain from His priests answers in His Name, which might explain away His law in favor of laxity or sin. So people now try to get ill-advised to do against God's will what they are bent on doing; only they get ill-advised for nothing. One who receives money for giving an irresponsible opinion, places himself in proximate peril of giving the answer which will please those who pay him. <sup>10</sup> "It is Simony to teach and preach the doctrine of Christ and His Gospel, or to give answers to quiet the conscience, for money. For the immediate object of these two acts, is the calling forth of faith, hope, charity, penitence, and other supernatural acts, and the reception of the consolation of the Holy Spirit; and this is, among Christians, their only value. Whence they are accounted things sacred and supernatural; for their immediate end is to things supernatural; and they are done by man, as he is an instrument of the Holy Ghost."<sup>11</sup>

thers not for himself but for the <sup>21</sup> poor saints at Jerusalem. But these poor saints were they who of the Jews first believed in Christ, and, being cast out by parents, kinsmen, connections, had lost their possessions and all their goods, the priests of the temple and the people destroying them. Let such poor receive. But if on plea of the poor, a few houses are enriched, and we eat in gold, glass and china, let us either with our wealth change our habit, or let not the habit of poverty seek the riches of Senators. What avails the habit of poverty, while a whole crowd of poor longs for the contents of our purse? Wherefore, for our sake who are such, who build up Zion with blood and Jerusalem by iniquity, who judge for gifts, give answers for rewards, divine for money, and thereon, claiming to ourselves a fictitious sanctity, say, Evil will not come upon us, hear we the sentence of the Lord which follows. Zion and Jerusalem and the mountain of the temple, i. e. the temple of Christ, shall, in the consummation and the end, when <sup>22</sup> love shall wax cold and the faith shall be rare<sup>23</sup>, be plowed as a field and become heaps as the high places of a forest; so that, where once were ample houses and countless heaps of corn, there should only be a poor cottage, keeping up the show of fruit which has no refreshment for the soul."

The three places, Zion, Jerusalem, the Temple, describe the whole city in its political and religious aspects. Locally, Mount Zion, which occupies the South-West, "had upon it the Upper city," and "was by much the loftier, and lengthways the straighter." Jerusalem, as contrasted with Zion, represented the lower city, <sup>24</sup> "supported" on the East by Mount Aera, and including the valley of Tyropæon. South of Mount Aera and lower than it, at the South Eastern corner of the city, lay Mount Moriah or the Mount of the Lord's House, separated at this time from Mount Aera by a deep ravine, which was filled up by the Asmonæan princes, who lowered Mount Aera. It was joined to the N. E. corner of Mount Zion by the causeway of Solomon across the Tyropæon. The whole city then in all its parts was to be desolated.

And her prophets divine for money. The word rendered<sup>25</sup>, divine, is always used in a bad sense. These prophets then were false prophets, her prophets and not God's, which divined, in reality or appearance, giving the answer which their employers, the rich men, wanted, as if it were an answer from God. <sup>26</sup> Yet they also judge for rewards, who look rather to the earthly than to the spiritual good; they teach for hire, who seek in the first place the things of this world, instead of teaching for the glory of God and the good of souls, and regarding earthly things in the second place only, as the support of life.

And say, Is not the Lord among us? And after all this, not understanding their sin, as though by their guilt they purchased the love of God, they said in their impenitence, that they were judges, prophets, priests, of God. They do all this, and yet lean on the Lord; they stay and trust, not in themselves, but in God: good in itself, had not they been evil! And say, Is not the Lord among us? none evil can [shall] come upon us. So Jeremiah says<sup>27</sup>, Trust ye not in lying words

12 Therefore shall Zion for your sake be

saying, The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, The temple of the Lord are these. <sup>1</sup>He called them lying words, as being oftentimes repeated by the false prophets, to entice the credulous people to a false security" against the threatenings of God. As though God could not forsake His own people, nor cast away Zion which He had chosen for an habitation for Himself, nor profane His own holy place! Yet it was true that God was among them, in the midst of them, as our Lord was among the Jews, though they knew Him not. Yet if not in the midst of His people so as to hallow, God is in the midst of them to punish. But what else do we than these Jews did, if we lean on the Apostolic line, the possession of Holy Scripture, Sacraments, pure doctrine, without setting ourselves to gain to God the souls of our Heathen population? or what else is it for a soul to trust in having been made a member of Christ, or in any gifts of God, unless it be bringing forth fruit with patience? <sup>2</sup>Learn we too hence, that all trust in the Merits of Christ is vain, so long as any wilfully persist in sin." <sup>3</sup>Know we, that God will be in us also, if we have not faith alone, nor on this account rest, as it were, on Him, but if to faith there be added also the excelling in good works. For faith without works is dead. But when with the riches of faith works concur, then will God indeed be with us, and will strengthen us mightily, and account us friends, and gladden us as His true sons, and free us from all evil."

12. Therefore shall Zion for your sake [for your sake shall Zion] be plowed as a field. They thought to be its builders; they were its destroyers. They imagined to advance or secure its temporal prosperity by bloods; they (as men ever do first or last,) ruined it. Zion might have stood, but for these its acute, far-sighted politicians, who scorned the warnings of the prophets, as well-meant ignorance of the world or of the necessities of the state. They taught, perhaps they thought, that for Zion's sake they, (act as they might,) were secure. Practical Antinomians! God says, that, for their sake, Zion, defiled by their deeds, should be destroyed. The fulfilment of the prophecy was delayed by the repentance under Hezekiah. Did he not, the elders ask <sup>3</sup>, fear the Lord and besought the Lord, and the Lord repented Him of the evil which He had pronounced against them? But the prophecy remained, like that of Jonah against Nineveh, and, when man undid and in act repented of his repentance, it found its fulfilment.

Jerusalem shall become heaps, [lit. of ruins <sup>4</sup>,] and the mountain of the house, Mount Moriah, on which the house of God stood, as the high places of the forest, lit. as high places of a forest. It should return wholly to what it had been, before Abraham offered up the typical sacrifice of his son, a wild and desolate place covered with tangled thickets <sup>5</sup>.

The prophecy had a first fulfilment at its first capture by Nebuchadnezzar. Jeremiah mourns over it; <sup>6</sup>Because of the mountain of Zion which is desolate, foxes walk [habitually <sup>7</sup>] upon it. Nehemiah said, <sup>8</sup>Ye see the distress that we are in, how Jerusalem lieth waste; and Sanballat mocked at the attempts to rebuild it, as a thing impossible; <sup>9</sup>Will they revive the stones out of the heaps of dust, and these too, burned? and the builders complained; <sup>10</sup>The strength of the bearers of burdens is decayed [lit. sinketh under them], and there is much dust, and we are not able to build the wall. In the desolation under Antiochus again it is related; <sup>11</sup>they saw the sanctuary desolate, and the altar profaned, and the gates burned up, and shrubs growing in the courts, as in a forest or in one of the mountains. When, by the shedding of the Blood of the Lord, they <sup>12</sup>filled up the measure of their fathers, and called the curse upon themselves, <sup>13</sup>His Blood be upon us and upon our children, destruction came upon them to the uttermost. With the exception of three towers, left to exhibit the greatness of Roman prowess in destroying such and so strong a city, they <sup>14</sup>so levelled to the ground the whole circuit of the city, that to a stranger it presented no token of ever having been inhabited." He "effaced the rest of the city," says the Jewish historian, himself an eyewitness <sup>15</sup>. The elder Pliny soon after, A.D. 77. speaks of it, as a city which had been and was not. <sup>16</sup>Where was Jerusalem, far the most renowned city, not of Judæa only, but of the East," <sup>17</sup>a funeral pile. With this corresponds S. Jerome's statement, <sup>18</sup>relics of the city remained for fifty years until the Emperor Hadrian." Still it was in utter ruins <sup>19</sup>. The toleration of the Jewish school at Jamnia <sup>20</sup> the more illustrates the desolation of Jerusalem where there was none. The Talmud <sup>21</sup> relates how R. Akiba smiled when others wept at seeing a fox coming out of the Holy of holies. This prophecy of Micah being fulfilled, he looked the more for the prophecy of good things to come, connected therewith. Not Jerusalem only, but well-nigh all Judæa was desolated by that war, in which a million and a half perished <sup>22</sup>, besides all who were sold as slaves. "Their country to which you would expel them, is destroyed, and there is no place to receive them," was Titus' expostulation <sup>23</sup> to the Antiochenes, who desired to be rid of the Jews their fellow-citizens. A heathen historian relates how, before the destruction by Hadrian, <sup>24</sup>"many wolves and hyenas entered their cities howling." Titus however having left above 6000 <sup>25</sup> Roman soldiers on the spot, a civil population was required to minister to their wants. The Christians who, following our Lord's warning, had fled to Pella <sup>26</sup>, returned to Jerusalem <sup>27</sup>, and continued there until the second destruction by Hadrian, under fifteen successive Bishops <sup>28</sup>. Some few Jews had been left there <sup>29</sup>; some very probably returned, since we hear of no prohibition from the

Romans, until after the fanatic revolt under Bar-cocheba. But the fact that when towards the close of Trajan's reign they burst out simultaneously, in one wild frenzy<sup>1</sup>, upon the surrounding Heathen, all along the coast of Africa, Libya, Cyrene, Egypt, the Thebais, Mesopotamia, Cyprus<sup>2</sup>, there was no insurrection in Judæa, implies that there were no great numbers of Jews there. Judæa, aforesaid the centre of rebellion, contributed nothing<sup>3</sup> to that wide national insurrection, in which the carnage was so terrible, as though it had been one convulsive effort of the Jews to root out their enemies<sup>4</sup>. Even in the subsequent war under Hadrian, Orosius speaks of them, as "laying waste the province of Palestine, once their own," as though they had gained possession of it from without, not by insurrection within it. The Jews assert that in the time of Joshua Ben Chananiah (under Trajan) "the kingdom of wickedness decreed that the temple should be rebuilt<sup>5</sup>." If this was so, the massacres towards the end of Trajan's reign altered the policy of the Empire. Apparently the Emperors attempted to extinguish the Jewish, as, at other times, the Christian faith. A heathen Author mentions the prohibition of circumcision<sup>7</sup>. The Jerusalem Talmud<sup>8</sup> speaks of many who for fear became uncircumcised, and renewed the symbol of their faith "when Bar Cozibah got the better, so as to reign 2½ years among them." The Jews add, that the prohibition extended to the keeping of the sabbath and the reading of the law<sup>10</sup>. Hadrian's city, Ælia, was doubtless intended, not only for a strong position, but also to efface the memory of Jerusalem by the Roman and Heathen city which was to replace it. Christians, when persecuted, suffered; Jews rebelled. The recognition of Barcocheba, who gave himself out as the Messiah<sup>11</sup>, by Akibah<sup>12</sup> and "all the wise [Jews] of his generation<sup>13</sup>," made the war national. Palestine was the chief seat of the war, but not its source. The Jews throughout the Roman world were in arms against their (Hist. Ar. p. 120. Chron. Syr. p. 56.) He is too late to be an authority; but his account equally implies that there was no rebellion in Judæa. <sup>4</sup> Dio speaks of their destroying 220,000 Romans and Greeks in Cyrene; committing much the same horrors in Egypt; destroying 240,000 in Cyprus. lxxiii. 32. The Jews, ascribing this to Barcocheba, say that they destroyed "in Africa a great multitude of Romans and Greeks like the sand on the sea-shore unnumerable," and in Egypt more than 200,000 men; and in Cyprus, so as to leave none. conquerors<sup>14</sup>; and the number of fortresses and villages which they got possession of, and which were destroyed by the Romans<sup>15</sup>, shews that their successes were far beyond Judæa. Their measures in Judæa attest the desolate condition of the country. They fortified, not towns, but "the advantageous positions of the country, strengthened them with mines and walls, that, if defeated, they might have places of refuge, and communication among themselves underground unperceived." For two years, (as appears from the coins struck by Barcocheba<sup>17</sup>), they had possession of Jerusalem. It was essential to his claim to be a temporal Messiah. They proposed, at least, to "rebuild their temple<sup>18</sup>" and restore their polity." But they could not fortify Jerusalem. Its siege is just named<sup>19</sup>; but the one place which obstinately resisted the Romans was a strong city near Jerusalem<sup>20</sup>, known before only as a deeply indented mountain tract, Bether<sup>21</sup>. Probably, it was one of the strong positions, fortified in haste, at the beginning of the war<sup>16</sup>.

The Jews fulfilled our Lord's words<sup>22</sup>, I am come in My Father's Name and ye receive Me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive. Their first destruction was the punishment of their Deicide, the crucifixion of Jesus, the Christ; their second they brought upon themselves by accepting a false Christ, a robber<sup>23</sup> and juggler<sup>24</sup>. 580,000 are said to have perished in battle<sup>25</sup>; besides "an incalculable number by famine and fire, so that all Judæa was made well-nigh a desert." The Jews say that "no olives remained in Palestine." Hadrian "destroyed it," making it "an utter desolation" and "effacing all remains of it." "We read<sup>26</sup>," says St. Jerome<sup>30</sup>, "the expedition of Ælius Hadrianus against the Jews, who so destroyed Jerusalem and its walls, as, from the fragments and ashes of the city to build a city, named from himself, Ælia." At this time<sup>31</sup> there appears to have been a formal act, whereby the Romans marked the legal annihilation of ci-

Romans made no account of them at first, but when all Judæa was moved and all the Jews throughout the world were set in commotion and conspired and publicly and privately inflicted much evil on the Romans, and many foreigners helped them in hope of gain, and the whole world was shaken, Hadrian sent his best general against them." Bayer mentions coins of the 3rd and 4th year, but anonymous. (Num. Hebr. Sam. p. 171.) De Sauley supposes these to belong to the revolt against Vespasian, (p. 153, 4.) The title and the name "Simon" which probably Barcocheba took, were doubtless intended to recall the memory of the Maccabees. The Jerusalem Talmud speaks of money with the impress of Ben Coziba, ("son of a lie" as the Jews changed his name.) Lightfoot, Opp. ii. 143. Mr Vaux, keeper of the coins, British Museum, tells me that these coins (of which some are in the British Museum) are certainly genuine. See also Madden, p. 161-182.

(See Robinson's or Kiepert's map.) There are traces both of fortifications and excavations, such as Dio speaks of. Bether as well as Bithron beyond Jordan (2 Sam. ii. 29.) had their name from deep incisions. (See the use of בֵּתֵר, בֵּתֵר, בֵּתֵר, Gen. xv. 10.) <sup>22</sup> S. John v. 43.

<sup>28</sup> S. Chrys. l. c. § 11. <sup>29</sup> S. Jerome then took this statement from written history. <sup>30</sup> in Joel i. 4. <sup>31</sup> The Mishnah places it after the capture of Bether. "On the 9th of Ab, it was decreed against our fathers, that they should not enter the land; and the Temple was laid ties; an act esteemed, at this time, one of most extreme severity<sup>1</sup>. When a city was to be built, its compass was marked with a plough; the Romans, where they willed to unmake a city, did, on rare occasions, turn up its soil with the plough. Hence the saying, "A city with a plough is built, with a plough overthrown." The city so ploughed forfeited all civil rights<sup>2</sup>; it was counted to have ceased to be. The symbolical act under Hadrian appears to have been directed against both the civil and religious existence of their city, since the revolts of the Jews were mixed up with their religious hopes. The Jews relate that both the city generally, and the Temple, were ploughed. The ploughing of the city was the last of those mournful memories, which made the month Ab a time of sorrow. But the ploughing of the temple is also especially recorded. S. Jerome says, "In this [the 5th Month] was the Temple at Jerusalem burnt and destroyed, both by Nebuchadnezzar, and many years afterwards by Titus and Vespasian; the city Bether, whither thousands of Jews had fled, was taken; the Temple was ploughed, as an insult to the conquered race, by Titus Annius Rufus." The Gemara says, "When Turnus, [or it may be "when Tyrant] Rufus ploughed the porch, [of the temple.] Perhaps Hadrian meant thus to declare the desecration of the site of the Temple, and so to make way for the further desecration by his temple of Jupiter. He would declare the worship of God at an end. The horrible desecration of placing the temple of Ashtaroth over the Holy Sepulchre<sup>3</sup> was probably a part of the same policy, to make the Holy City utterly Heathen. The "Capitoline"<sup>4</sup> was part of its new name in honor of the Jupiter of the Roman Capitol. Hadrian intended, not to rebuild Jerusalem, but to build a new city under his own name. "The city being thus bared of the Jewish nation, and its old inhabitants having been utterly destroyed, and an alien race settled there, the Roman city which afterwards arose, having changed its name, is called Ælia in honor of the Emperor Ælius Hadrianus." It was a Roman colony<sup>5</sup>, with Roman temples, Roman amphitheatres. Idolatry was stamped on its coins<sup>6</sup>. Hadrian excluded from it, on the North, almost the whole of Bezetha or the new city, which Agrippa had enclosed by his wall, and, on the South, more than half of Mount Zion<sup>7</sup>, which was left, as Micah foretold, to be ploughed as a field. The Jews themselves were prohibited from entering the Holy Land<sup>8</sup>, so that the heathen Celsus says, "they have neither a clod nor a hearth left." Ælia, then, being a new city, Jerusalem was spoken of, as having ceased to be. The Roman magistrates, even in Palestine, did not know the name<sup>9</sup>. Christians too used the name Ælia<sup>10</sup>, and that, in solemn documents, as the Canon of Nice<sup>11</sup>. In the 4th century the city was still called by the Christians<sup>12</sup>, and, on the first Mohammedan coin<sup>17</sup> in the 7th century, it still bore that name. A series of writers speak of the desolation of Jerusalem. In the next century Origen addresses a Jew, "If going to the earthly city, Jerusalem, thou shalt find it overthrown, reduced to dust and ashes, weep not, as ye now do." "From that [Hadrian's] time until now, the extremest desolation having taken possession of the place, their once renowned hill of Zion—now no wise differing from the rest of the country, is cultivated by Romans, so that we ourselves have with our own eyes observed the place ploughed by oxen and sown all over. And Jerusalem, being inhabited by aliens, has to this day the stones gathered out of it, all the inhabitants, in our own times too, gathering up the stones out of its ruins for their private or public and common buildings. You may observe with your own eyes the mournful sight, how the stones from the Temple itself and from the Holy of holies have been taken for the idol-temples and to build amphitheatres." "Their once holy place has now come to such a state, as in no way to fall short of the overthrow of Sodom." S. Hilary, who had been banished into the East, says, "The Royal city of David, taken by the Babylonians and overthrown, held not its queenly dignity under the rule of its lords; but, taken afterwards and burnt by the Romans, it now is not." S. Cyril of Jerusalem, Bishop of the new town, and delivering his catechetical lectures in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, pointed out to his hearers the fulfilment of prophecy; "The place [Zion] is now filled with gardens of cucumbers." "If they [the Jews] plead the captivity," says S. Athanasius<sup>23</sup>, "and say that on that ground Jerusalem is not." "The whole world, over which they are scattered," says S. Gregory of Nazianzum<sup>24</sup>, "is one monument of their calamity, their worship closed, and the soil of Jerusalem itself scarcely known."

It is apparently part of the gradual and increasing fulfilment of God's word, that the ploughing of the city and of the site of the Temple, and the continued cultivation of so large a portion of Zion, are recorded in the last visitation when its iniquity was full. It still remains ploughed as a field. "At the time I visited this sacred ground, one part of it supported a crop of barley, another was undergoing the labour of the plough, and the soil, turned up, consisted of stone and lime filled with earth, such as is usually met with in the foundations of ruined cities. It is nearly a mile in circumference." "On the S. E. Zion slopes down, in a series of cultivated terraces, sharply though not abruptly, to the sites of the Kings' gardens.—Here and round to the S. the whole declivities are sprinkled with olive trees, which grow luxuriantly among the narrow slips of corn." Not Christians only, but Jews also have seen herein the fulfilment upon themselves of Micah's words, spoken now "26 centuries ago."

cir. 710. 1 The glory, 3 peace, 8 kingdom, 11 and victory of the church.

V. 1. But [And] in the last days it shall come to pass. God's promises, goodness, truth, fail not. He withdraweth His Presence from those who receive Him not, only to give Himself to those who will receive Him. Mercy is the sequel and end of chastisement. Micah then joins on this great prophecy of future mercy to the preceding woe, as its issue in the order of God's Will. And it shall be. He fixes the mind to some great thing which shall come to pass; it shall be. Then follows, in marked reference to the preceding privations, a superabundance of mercy. For the mountain of the house, which should be as a forest and which was left unto them desolate, there is the mountain of the Lord's house established; for the heap of dust and the ploughed field, there is the flowing-in of the Gentiles; for the night and darkness, that there shall be no vision, there is the fulness of revelation; for corrupt judgment, teaching, divining, a law from God Himself going forth through the world; for the building of Jerusalem with blood, one universal peace.

In the last days, lit. the end<sup>1</sup> of the days, i. e. of those days which are in the thoughts of the speaker. Politically, there are many beginnings and many endings; as many endings as there are beginnings, since all human polity begins, only to end, and to be displaced in its turn by some new beginning, which too runs its course, only to end. Religiously, there are but two consummations. All time, since man fell, is divided into two halves, the looking forward to Christ to come in humility; the looking forward to His Coming in glory. These are the two events on which man's history turns. To that former people the whole period of Christ's kingdom was one future, the fulness of all their own shadows, types, sacrifices, services, prophecies, longings, being. The end of their days was the beginning of the new Day of Christ: the coming of His Day was necessarily the close of the former days, the period of the dispensation which prepared for it. The Prophets then by the words, the end of the days, always mean the times of the Gospel<sup>2</sup>. The end of the days is the close of all which went before, the last dispensation, after which there shall be no other. Yet this too has last days of its own, which shall close God's kingdom of grace and shall issue in the Second Coming of Christ; as the end of those former days, which closed the times of "the law," issued in His First Coming. We are then at once living in the last times, and looking on to a last time still to come. In the one way St. Peter speaks<sup>3</sup> of the last times, or the end of the times<sup>4</sup>, in which Christ was manifested for us, in contrast with the foundations of the world, before which He was foreordained. And St. Paul contrasts God's<sup>5</sup> speaking to the fathers in the Prophets, and at the end of these days<sup>6</sup> speaking to us in the Son; and of our Lord coming<sup>7</sup> at the end, consummation, of the times<sup>8</sup>, to put away sins by the sacrifice of Himself; and says that the things which befel the Jews<sup>9</sup> were written for our admonition, unto whom the ends of the times<sup>10</sup> [i. e. of those of the former people of whom he had been speaking] are come; and St. John speaks of this as<sup>11</sup> the last time. In the other way, they contrast the last days, not with the times before them but with their own, and then plainly they are a last and distant part of this their own last time. <sup>12</sup>The Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith: <sup>13</sup>In the last days perilous times shall come: <sup>14</sup>There shall come at the end of the days scoffers: <sup>15</sup>They told you that there should be mockers in the last time. The Jews distributed all time between "this world" and "the coming world"<sup>16</sup>, including under "the coming world" the time of grace under the Messiah's reign, and the future glory. To us the names have shifted, since this present world<sup>17</sup> is to us the kingdom of Christ, and there remains nothing further on this earth to look to, beyond what God has already given us. Our future then, placed as we are between the two Comings of our Lord, is, of necessity, beyond this world<sup>18</sup>.

The mountain of the house of the Lord shall be [abidingly] established. He does not say merely, it shall be established. Kingdoms may be established at one time, and then come to an end. He says, it shall be a thing established<sup>19</sup>. His saying is expanded by Daniel; <sup>20</sup>In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall not be destroyed for ever, and it shall abide for ever. The house of the Lord was the centre of His worship, the token of His Presence, the pledge of His revelations and of His abiding acceptance, protection, favor. All these were to be increased and continuous. The image is one familiar to us in the Hebrew Scriptures. People were said to go up<sup>21</sup> to it, as to a place of dignity. In the Psalm on the carrying of the Ark thither, the hill of God is compared to the many-topped mountains of Basan<sup>22</sup>, (the Hermon-peaks which bound Basan,) and so declared to be greater than they, as being the object of God's choice. The mountain where God was worshipped rose above the mountains of idolatry. Ezekiel, varying the image, speaks of the Gospel as an overshadowing cedar<sup>23</sup>, planted by God upon an high mountain and an eminent, in the mountain of the height of Israel, under which should dwell all fowl of every wing; and, in his vision of the Temple, he sees this, the image of the Christian Church, <sup>24</sup>upon a very high mountain. Our Lord speaks of His Apostles and the Church in them, as <sup>25</sup>a city set upon a hill which cannot be hid. The seat of God's worship was to be seen far and wide; nothing was to obscure it. It, now lower than the surrounding hills, was then to be as on the summit of them. Human elevation, the more exalted it is, the more unstable is it. Divine greatness alone is at once solid and exalted. The new kingdom of God was at once to be exalted above the hills, and established on the top of the mountains; exalted, at once, above every thing human, and yet established, strong as the mountains on which it rested, and unassailable, unconquerable, seated secure aloft, between heaven, whence it came and to which it tends, and earth, on which it just rests in the sublime serenity of its majesty.

The image sets forth the supereminence of the Lord's House above all things earthly. It does not define wherein that greatness consists. The flowing in of the nations is a fruit of it<sup>1</sup>. The immediate object of their coming is explained to be, to learn to know and to do the will of God<sup>2</sup>. But the new revelation does not form all its greatness. That greatness is from the Presence of God, revealing and evermore teaching His Will, ruling, judging, rebuking, peacemaking<sup>3</sup>. "The mountain of the Lord's House was then exalted above the hills by the bodily Presence of Christ, when He, in the Temple built on that mountain, spake, preached, worked so many miracles; as, on the same ground, Haggai saith<sup>4</sup>, the glory of this latter house shall be greater than the glory of the former." "This mountain, the Church of Christ, transcends all laws, schools, doctrines, religions, Synagogues of Jews and Philosophers, which seemed to rise aloft among men, like mountain-tops, yet, whatever under the sun is sublime and lofty, it will overpass, trample on, subdue to itself."

Even Jews have seen the meaning of this figure. Their oldest mystical book explains it<sup>5</sup>. "And it shall be in the last days, when namely the Lord shall visit the daughter of Jacob, then shall the mountain of the house of the Lord be firmly established, i.e. the Jerusalem which is above, which shall stand firmly in its place, that it may shine by the light which is above. (For no light can retain its existence, except through the light from above.) For in that time shall the light from above shine sevenfold more than before; according to that<sup>6</sup>, Moreover the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun; and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold, as the light of seven days, in the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of His people and healeth the stroke of their wound." Another, of the dry literal school, says<sup>7</sup>, "It is well known that the house of the Temple is not high. The meaning then is, that its fame shall go forth far, and there shall return to it from all quarters persons with offerings, so that it shall be, as if it were on the top of all hills, so that all the inhabitants of the earth should see it."

Some<sup>10</sup> interpret the mountain to be Christ, Who is called the Rock<sup>11</sup>, on the confession of Whom, God-Man, the house of the Lord, i.e. the Church is built<sup>12</sup>, the precious Corner-stone<sup>13</sup>, which is laid, beside which no foundation can be laid<sup>14</sup>; the great mountain, of which Daniel<sup>15</sup> prophesied. It is firmly established, so that the gates of Hell shall not prevail against the Church, being built thereon; exalted above hills and mountains, i.e. above all besides, greater or smaller, which has any eminence; for He in truth is<sup>16</sup> highly exalted and hath a Name above every name, being<sup>17</sup> at the Right Hand of God in the heavenly places, far above all principality and power and night and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world but also in that which is to come; and all things are under His Feet. And this for us, in that He, the Same, is the Head over all things to the Church which is His Body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all. "He is God and Man, King and Priest, King of kings, and a Priest abiding for ever. Since then His Majesty reacheth to the Right Hand of God, neither mountains nor hills, Angels nor holy men, reach there-to; for<sup>18</sup> to which of the Angels said God at any time, Sit thou on My Right Hand?"

"Aloft then is the Church of God raised, both in that its Head is in heaven and the Lord of all, and that, on earth, it is not like the Temple, in one small people, but<sup>21</sup> set on a hill that it cannot be hid, or remain unseen even to those far from it. Its doctrine too and life are far above the wisdom of this world, shewing in them nothing of earth, but are above; its wisdom is the knowledge and love of God and of His Son Jesus Christ, and its life is hid with Christ in God, in those who are justified in Him and hallowed by His Spirit." In Him, it is lifted above all things, and with the eyes of the mind beholdeth (as far as may be) the glory of God, soaring on high towards Him Who is the Author of all being, and, filled with Divine light, it owneth Him the Maker of all.

And people, [peoples, nations,] shall flow unto [lit. upon] it. A mighty tide should set in to the Gospel. The word<sup>22</sup> is appropriated to the streaming in of multitudes, such as of old poured into Babylon, the merchant-empress of the world<sup>23</sup>. It is used of the distant nations who should throng in one continuous stream into the Gospel, or of Israel streaming together from the four corners of the world<sup>24</sup>. So Isaiah foretells<sup>25</sup>, Thy gates shall be open continually; they shall not be shut day nor night; that they may bring unto thee the forces of the Gentiles, and that their kings may be brought. These were to flow upon it, perhaps so as to cover it, expressing both the multitude and density of the throng of nations, how full the Church should be, as the swollen river spreads itself over the whole champaign country, and the surging flood-tide climbs up the face of the rock which bounds it. The flood once covered the highest mountains to destroy life; this flood should pour in for the saving of life. "It is a miracle, if waters ascend from a valley and flow to a mountain. So is it a miracle that earthly nations should ascend to the Church, whose doctrine and life are lofty, arduous, sublime. This the grace of Christ effecteth, mighty and lofty, as being sent from heaven. As then waters, conducted from the fountains by pipes into a valley, in that valley bound up and rise nearly to their original height, so these waters of heavenly grace, brought down into vallies, i.e. the hearts of men, make them to bound up with them into heaven and enter upon and embrace a heavenly life."

2. And many nations shall come. Isaiah<sup>27</sup> added the word all to Micah's prophecy. So our Lord said, This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and the elect are to be gathered out of all nations and kindreds and people and tongues<sup>28</sup>. nations shall flow into it. The all might be many or few. Both prophets say that those all should be many. Judah probably knew already of many. The history of Genesis gave them a wide-expanding knowledge of the enlargement of mankind after the flood, in Europe, Asia, Africa, as they then existed in their nations. The sons of Japhet had already spread over the whole coast of our Western sea, and far North; the Cimmerians<sup>1</sup>, or Cwmry, Scandinavians<sup>2</sup>, Carpathians<sup>3</sup>, (probably Celts,) Armenians<sup>4</sup>, (including the kindred Phrygians,) Scythians<sup>5</sup>, Medes, Ionians<sup>6</sup>, Æolians<sup>7</sup>, Iberians<sup>8</sup>, Cypriotes<sup>9</sup>, Dardani<sup>10</sup>, Tybarenes<sup>11</sup>, Moschi<sup>12</sup>, and the Turseni<sup>13</sup>, or perhaps the Thracians. On the East, the sons of Shem had spread in Elam, Asshur, Arrapachitis<sup>14</sup>; they occupied the intervening tract of Aram; in the N. W. they reached to Lydia. Southward the sons of Joktan were in Arabia. Micah's hearers knew how, of the sons of Ham, Cush had spread far to the S. E. and S. from Babylonia to Æthiopia; Egypt they remembered too well, and, beyond it, they knew of the far-scattered tribes of the Libyans, who extended along the coast of Africa. Phœnician trade filled up this great outline. They themselves had, in Solomon's time, traded with India<sup>15</sup>; about this time, we know that they were acquainted with the furthest East, China<sup>16</sup>. Such was the sight before the human mind of the Prophet; such the extent of the nations whom his people knew of. Some were the deadly enemies of his people; some were to be its conquerors. He knew that the ten tribes were to be abidingly wanderers among the nations<sup>17</sup>, despised by them<sup>18</sup>; "a people, the strangers and sojourners of the whole world"<sup>19</sup>. He knew many of those nations to be sunk in idolatry, viciousness; proud, contemptuous, lawless; he saw them fixed in their idolatries. All people will walk every one in the name of his god. But he saw what eye of man could not see, what the will of man could not accomplish, that He, Whom now Judah alone partially worshipped, would turn the hearts of His creatures to Himself, to seek Him, not in their own ways, but as He should reveal Himself at Jerusalem. Micah tells them distinctly, that those who should believe would be a great multitude from many nations. In like way Isaiah expresses the great multitude of those for whom Christ should atone. <sup>20</sup>He bare the sin of many. <sup>21</sup>By knowledge of Him shall My righteous Servant make many righteous. And our Lord Himself says; <sup>22</sup>The Son of man came to give His life a ransom for many. <sup>23</sup>This is My Blood—which is shed for many for the remission of sins. In Micah's time not one people, scarcely some poor fragments of the Jewish people, went up to worship God at Zion, to call to remembrance His benefits, to learn of Him. Those who should thereafter worship Him, should be many nations.

And say, exhorting one another, in fervor and mutual love, as Andrew exhorted his brother Simon, and Philip Nathanael, and the woman of Samaria those of her city, to come to Christ: and so all since, who have been won by Him, by word or example, by preaching or by deed, in public or in private, been along with them others to seek Him Whom they themselves have found.

Let us go up, leaving the lowness and earthliness of their former conversation, and mounting upward on high where Christ is, desiring righteousness, and athirst to know His ways.

To the house of the God of Jacob. They shall seek Him as Jacob sought Him, "who left his father's house and removed into another land, was a man of heavy toils and served for hire, but obtained special help from God, and, undistinguished as he was, became most glorious. So too the Church, leaving all Heathen wisdom, and having its conversation in Heaven, and therefore persecuted and enduring many hardships, enjoys now glory with God."

And He, i. e. the God of Jacob of Whom he had just spoken, shall teach us of His ways. They do not go to God, because they know Him, but that they may know Him. They are drawn by a mighty impulse towards Him. Howsoever attracted, they come, not making bargains with God, (as some now would,) what they should be taught, that He should reveal to them nothing transcending reason, nothing exceeding or contradicting their notions of God; they do not come with reserves, that God should not take away this or that error, or should not disclose any thing of His incomprehensibleness. They come in holy simplicity, to learn whatever He will condescend to tell them; in holy confidence, that He, the Infallible Truth, will teach them infallibly. They say, of His ways. For all learning is by degrees, and all which all creatures could learn in all eternity falls infinitely short of His truth and Holiness. Nay, in all eternity the highest creature which He has made and which He has admitted most deeply into the secrets of His Wisdom will be as infinitely removed as ever from the full knowledge of His Wisdom and His Love. For what is finite, enlarged, expanded, accumulated to the utmost degree possible, remains finite still. It has no proportion to the Infinite. But even here, all growth in grace implies growth in knowledge. The more we love God, the more we know of Him; and with increased knowledge of Him come higher perceptions of worship, praise, thanksgiving, of the character of faith, hope, charity, of our outward and inward acts and relations to God, the unboundedness of God's love to us and the manifoldness of the ways of pleasing Him, which, in His love, He has given us. Since then the whole Christian life is a growth in grace, and even St. Paul, <sup>25</sup>forgetting those things which are behind and reaching forth to those which are before, pressed towards the mark for the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, then St. Paul too was ever learning, in intensity, what he knew certainly by revelation, of His ways. Again, as each blade of grass is said to differ from another, so, and much more, each soul of man which God has created for Himself. No one ever saw or could imagine two human beings, in whom the grace of God had unfolded itself in exactly the same way. Each saint will have his distinct beauty around the Throne. But then each will have learnt of His ways, in

in envy, hatred, maliciousness, wrong, so the inward peace whereof He saith, My peace I give unto you, shall, wherever it reacheth, spread out abroad and, by the power of grace, bring to "all nations unity, peace, and concord." All, being brought under the one empire of Christ, shall be in harmony, one with the other. As far as in it lies, the Gospel is a Gospel of peace, and makes peace. Christians, as far as they obey Christ, are at peace, both in themselves and with one another. And this is what is here prophesied. The peace follows from His rule. Where He judges and rebukes, there even the mighty beat their swords into ploughshares. The universal peace, amid which our Lord was born in the flesh, the first which there had been since the foundation of the Roman empire, was, in God's Providence, a fruit of His kingdom. It was no chance coincidence, since nothing is by chance. God willed that they should be contemporaneous. It was fitting that the world should be still, when its Lord, the Prince of peace, was born in it. That outward cessation of public strife, though but for a brief time, was an image how His peace spread backwards as well as forwards, and of the peace which through Him, our Peace, was dawning on the world. "First, according to the letter, before that Child was born to us, <sup>3</sup>on Whose shoulder the government is, the whole world was full of blood; people fought against people, kings against kings, nations against nations. Lastly, the Roman state itself was torn by civil wars, in whose battles all kingdoms shed blood. But after that, at the time of the Empire of Christ, Rome gained an undivided empire, the world was laid open to the journeys of Apostles, and the gates of cities were open to them, and, for the preaching of the One God, one single empire was formed. It may too be understood as an image, that, on receiving the faith of Christ, anger and unrestrained revilings were laid aside, so that each putteth his hand to the plough and looketh not back, and, breaking in pieces the shafts of contumelies, seeketh to reap spiritual fruit, so that, others labouring, we enter into their labours; and of us it is said, They shall come with joy, bringing their sheaves<sup>1</sup>. Now no one fighteth; for we read, <sup>5</sup>Blessed are the peacemakers; no one learneth to <sup>6</sup>strive, to the subverting of the hearers. And every one shall rest under his vine, so as to press out that <sup>7</sup>Wine which gladdeneth the heart of man, under that <sup>8</sup>Vine, whereof the Father is the Husbandman; and under his figtree, gathering the sweet <sup>9</sup>fruits of the Holy Spirit, love, joy, peace, and the rest."

The fathers had indeed a joy, which we have not, that wars were not between Christians; for although "just wars are lawful," war cannot be on both sides just; very few wars have not, on both sides, what is against the spirit of the Gospel. For, except where there is exceeding wickedness on one side, or peril of further evil, the words of our Lord would hold good, in public as in private, <sup>10</sup>I say unto you, that ye resist not evil.

This prophecy then is fulfilled 1) in the character of the Gospel. "The law of the Gospel worketh and preserveth peace. For it plucketh up altogether the roots of all war, avarice, ambition, injustice, wrath. Then, it teacheth to bear injuries, and, so far from requiting them, willeth that we be prepared to receive fresh wrongs. He saith, <sup>12</sup>If any one smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also, &c. <sup>13</sup>I say unto you, Love your enemies, &c. For neither did the old law give these counsels, nor did it explain so clearly the precept implied in them, nor had it that wonderful and most efficacious example of the patience and love of Christ, nor did it supply grace, whereby peace could be preserved; whereas now the first-fruits of the Spirit are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness." 2) The prophecy has been fulfilled within and without, among individuals or bodies of men, in body or mind, in temper or in deed, as far as the Gospel has prevailed. <sup>14</sup>The multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one mind; one, through One indwelling Spirit; one, though a great multitude, through one bond of love. "See how these Christians love one another;" "see how ready they are to die for one another," was, in the third century, a heathen proverb as to Christian love. "They love one another, almost before they know one another." "Their first lawgiver has persuaded them that they are all brethren." "We (which grieves you)," the Christian answered <sup>15</sup>, "so love one another, because we know not how to hate. We call ourselves 'brethren' which you take ill, as men who have one Father, God, and are sharers in one faith, in one hope, coheirs." For centuries too, there was, for the most part, public peace of Christians among themselves. Christian soldiers fought only, as constrained by the civil law, or against Barbarian invaders, to defend life, wife, children, not for ambition, anger, or pride. Christians could then appeal, in fulfilment of the prophecy, to this outward, the fruit of the inward, peace. "We," says an early martyr <sup>16</sup>, "who formerly stained ourselves with mutual slaughter, not only do not wage war with foes, but even, in order not to lie and deceive those who consume us, willingly professing Christ, meet death." "From the coming of the Lord," says another martyr <sup>20</sup>, "the New Testament, reconciling unto peace, and a life-giving law, went forth into all lands. If then another law and word, going forth from Jerusalem, produced such peace among the nations which received it, and thereby reproved much people of want of wisdom, then it would follow that the prophets spake of some other. But if the law of liberty, that is, the law of God preached by the Apostles, which went forth out of Jerusalem to all the world, worked such a transformation, that swords and spears of war He wrought into plough-shares and pruning-hooks, instruments of peace, and now men know not how to fight, but, when smitten, yield the other cheek, then the prophets spake of no other, but of Him who brought it to pass." "Even from this," says Tertullian <sup>21</sup>, "you may know that Christ was promised, not as one mighty in war, but as a peace-bringer. Either deny that these things were prophesied, since they are plain to see; or, since they are written, deny that they are fulfilled. But if thou mayest deny neither, thou must own that they are fulfilled in Him, of Whom they are prophesied." "Of old <sup>22</sup>," says St. Athanasius, "Greeks and Barbarians, being idolaters, warred with one another, and were fierce towards those akin. For through their implacable warfare no one might pass land or sea, unarmed. Their whole life was passed in arms; the sword was to them for staff and stay. They worshipped idols, sacrificed to demons, and yet from their reverence for idols they could gain no help to correct their minds. But when they passed into the school of Christ, then, of a truth, pricked in mind, they wondrously laid aside their savage slaughters, and now think no more of things of war; for now all peace and friendship are alone their mind's delight. Who then did this, Who blended in peace those who hated one another, save the Beloved Son of the Father, the common Saviour of all, Christ Jesus, Who, through His love, endured all things for our salvation? For of old too, the peace which should hold sway from Him was prophesied, they shall beat their swords into ploughshares. Nor is this incredible, since now too, the Barbarians with innate savageness, while they yet sacrifice to their idols, are mad with one another, and cannot for one hour part with their swords. But when they have received the teaching of Christ, forthwith for ever they turn to husbandry; and, in lieu of arming their hands with swords, stretch them out to prayer. And altogether, instead of warring with one another, they arm themselves against the devil and demons, warring against them with modesty and virtue of soul. This is a token of the Godhead of the Saviour. For what men could not learn among idols, this they have learned from Him. Christ's disciples, having no war with one another, array themselves against demons by their life and deeds of virtue, chase them and mock their captain the devil, chaste in youth, enduring in temptation, strong in toils, tranquil when insulted, unconcerned when despoiled."

And yet later, S. Chrysostome says, "1 Before the Coming of Christ, all men armed themselves and no one was exempt from this service, and cities fought with cities, and every where were men trained to war. But now most of the world is in peace; all engage in mechanical art or agriculture or commerce, and few are employed in military service for all. And of this too the occasion would cease, if we acted as we ought and did not need to be reminded by afflictions." "2 After the Sun of righteousness dawned, so far are all cities and nations from living in such perils, that they know not even how to take in hand any affairs of war.—Or if there be still any war, it is far off at the extremity of the Roman Empire, not in each city and country, as heretofore. For then, in any one nation, there were countless seditious and multiform wars. But now the whole earth which the sun surveys from the Tigris to the British isles, and therewith Lybia too and Egypt and Palestine, yea, all beneath the Roman rule,—ye know how all enjoy complete security, and learn of war only by hearsay." S. Cyril<sup>3</sup> and Theodoret<sup>4</sup> carry on this account into the fifth century after our Lord's Coming. Christians then during those four centuries could point to a present fulfilment of prophecy, when we, for our sins, can only speak of the past. "The Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save: neither His ear heavy, that it cannot hear; but our iniquities have separated between us, and our God, and our sins have hid His Face from us, that He will not hear." Those first Christians could urge against the Jews the fulfilment of their prophecies herein, where the Jews can now urge upon us their seeming non-fulfilment; "5 In the time of king Messiah, after the wars of Gog and Magog, there shall be peace and tranquillity in all the world, and the sons of men shall have no need of weapons, but these promises were not fulfilled." The prophecy is fulfilled, in that the Gospel is a Gospel of peace and makes peace. Christians, as far as they obey Christ, are at peace both in themselves and with one another. The promises of God are perfect on His part: He is faithful to them. But He so wills to be freely loved by His intelligent creatures whom He formed for His love, that He does not force our free-agency. We can fall short of His promises, if we will. To those only who will it, the Gospel brings peace, stilling the passions, quelling disputes, banishing contentions, removing errors, calming concupiscence, soothing and repressing anger, in individuals, nations, the Church; giving oneness of belief, harmony of soul, contentment with our own, love of others as ourselves; so that whatever is contrary to this has its origin in something which is not of Christ nor of His Gospel.

4. But (And) they shall sit every man, under his vine and under his fig-tree. Palestine was a home of the vine and the fig-tree. Vineyards were a common property, possessed by all but the very poor<sup>6</sup>, or even by them<sup>7</sup>. The land was "a land of bread and vineyards." The vine was the emblem of the people, in Psalmists and Prophets<sup>8</sup>. The bunch of grapes or the vine-leaf appear as characteristic emblems on Jewish coins<sup>9</sup>, chiefly in the times of their revolts under Vespasian and Hadrian<sup>10</sup>. The fig is also mentioned as part of the characteristic fruitfulness of Palestine<sup>11</sup>. It too was an universal property<sup>12</sup>. Both formed natural arbours; the fig had its name probably from its length<sup>13</sup>, the vine from the arch made by its drooping boughs<sup>14</sup>. Both formed, in those hot countries, a grateful shade. The vine, rising with its single stem, was spread over trellis-work or by props, so as to enclose a considerable space<sup>15</sup>. Even in Italy, a single vine shaded a portico<sup>16</sup>. In Palestine it grew by the walls of the house<sup>17</sup>. Rabbins relate how their forefathers sat and studied under the fig-tree<sup>18</sup>, as Nathanael was doubtless meditating or praying under one, when Jesus, being God, saw him<sup>19</sup>. It exhibits a picture of domestic peace<sup>20</sup>, each family gathered in harmony and rest under the protection of God, each content with what they have, neither coveting another's, nor disturbed in their own. Wine is explained in Holy Scripture to be an emblem of gladness, and the fig of sweetness<sup>21</sup>. "22 For exceeding sweet is the word of the Saviour, and it knoweth how to gladden man's heart; sweet also and full of joy is the hope of the future, wherewith we are enriched in Christ."

Such had been Israel's lot in the peaceful days of Solomon<sup>1</sup>, the peace of whose times had already been made the image of the Gospel<sup>2</sup>; the coming of the Queen of the South from the uttermost parts of the earth, to hear the wisdom of Solomon<sup>3</sup>, had made her kingdom to be selected as an emblem of those who should fall down before Christ and serve Him<sup>4</sup>. "6 Such is that most quiet fearlessness which the law of Christ bringeth, as being the law of charity, peace, and concord."

And none shall make them afraid. "6 Neither man, nor devil; for the Lord hath given us power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy, and said, nothing shall by any means hurt you, and bade us, fear not them which kill the body." Witness the might which He gave to His Apostles and Martyrs.

For the mouth of the Lord of Hosts hath spoken it. The Prophets often add this, when what they say, seems, for its greatness, past belief. Yet it will be, because He hath spoken it, the Lord Who changeth not, the Lord of Hosts, to Whose commands all creatures are subject, Whose word is truth with Whom to speak is to do.

5 For all people will walk, every one in the name of his god, and we will walk in the name of the Lord our God. Hitherto unsteadfastness had been the very characteristic sin of Israel. It was "constant only in its inconstancy," ever falling away like their forefathers, starting aside like a broken bow. The heathen persevered in their worship, because it was evil or had evil in it, not checking but feeding their passions. Israel did not persevere in his, because it required him to deny himself things unlawful. "11 Hath a nation changed their gods which are yet no gods? But My people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit. Henceforth, the Prophet professeth for his people, the true Israel, that he will be as steadfast in good, as the heathen in evil; so our Lord sets forth the children of this world in their generation, as an example of wisdom to the children of light.

"13 They who are eager to go up into the mountain of the Lord, and wish to learn thoroughly His ways, promise a ready obedience, and receive in themselves the glories of the life in Christ, and undertake with their whole strength to be earnest in all holiness. 'For let every one,' he saith, 'in every country and city go the way himself chooseth, and pass his life, as to him seemeth good; but our care is Christ, and His laws we will make our straight path; we will walk along with Him; and that not for this life only, present or past, but yet more for what is beyond. "14 It is a faithful saying. For they who now suffer with Him, shall walk with Him for ever, and with Him be glorified, and with Him reign. But they make Christ their care, who prefer nothing to His love, who cease from the vain distractions of the world, and seek rather righteousness and what is pleasing unto Him, and to excel in virtue. Such an one was the divine Paul; for he writeth, "15 I am crucified with Christ; and now no longer I live, but Christ liveth in me; and again<sup>16</sup>, I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified.

To walk is so uniformly in Holy Scripture used of a person's moral or religious "ways"<sup>17</sup> (as we say), that the Prophet here too is doubtless speaking of the opposite religious ways of the Heathen and of the future people of God. The name was often, in Hebrew, expressive of the character; and, in regard to God Himself, that Name which He vouchsafed to give to Himself<sup>18</sup>, expressed His Self-existence, and, as a result, His Unchangeableness and His Faithfulness. The names, by which it was foretold that Christ should be called, express both His Deity and attributes<sup>19</sup>; the human Name, which He bare and vouchsafes to bear yet, was significant of His office for us, Saviour<sup>20</sup>. To praise the Name of the Lord then, is to praise Him in that character or relation which He has revealed to us. "21 He walketh in the Name of the Lord, who ordereth every act and motion worthily of the vocation wherewith he is called, and, "22 whether he eateth or drinketh, doth all to the glory of God." This promise hath its own reward; for it is for ever and ever. They who walk in the Name of the Lord, shall walk before Him in the land of the living, for ever and ever. Such walk on, with quickened steps, lingering not, in the Name of the Lord our God, i. e. doing all things in His Name, as His great Name requires, conformed to the holiness and all other qualities which His Name expresseth. For ever and ever, lit. for ever and yet, or, more strictly still, for that which is hidden and yet, which is the utmost thought of eternity we can come to. Time indeed has no relation to eternity; for time, being God's creature, is finite; eternity, being the mode of the existence of God, is infinite. Still, practically to us, our nearest conception of eternity, is existence, on and on and on, an endless, unchanging, ever-prolonged future, lost in distance and hidden from us, and then, and yet, an ever-to-come yet, which shall never come to an end. Well then may we not faint, as tho' it were long to toil or to do without this or that, since the part of our way which lies amid toils and weariness is so short, and will soon be at an end; what lies beyond, in joy, is infinite in infinite joy, ever full and still ever a yet to come.

The Prophet says, we will walk; "21 uniting himself in longing, hope, faith, to the sons of the New Testament, i. e. Christians, as his brethren, reborn by the grace of the same Christ;" "22 ministers of the Old, heirs of the New Testament, because they loved through that same faith whereby we love; believing in the Incarnation, Passion, Resurrection of Christ yet to be, as we believe in it, having been."

chiefly through the coming-in of the Gentiles. Now he adds, how the Jews should, with them, be gathered by grace into the one fold, in that long last day of the Gospel, at the beginning, in the course of it, and completely at the end<sup>1</sup>.

Her that halteth. The Prophet resumes the image of the scattered flock, under which he had before<sup>2</sup> foretold their restoration. This was no hope of his own, but His word Who cannot fail. The course of events, upon which he is entering, would be, at times, for their greatness and their difficulty, past human belief. So he adds straightway, at the outset, saith the Lord. To halt is used of bodily lameness<sup>3</sup>, and that, of a flock, worn out by its wanderings<sup>4</sup>. It is used also of moral halting<sup>5</sup>, such as had been a chief sin of Israel, serving partly God, partly Baal<sup>6</sup>; God, with a service of fear, Baal with a service of that counterfeit of love, sensuality. So it was sick, both in body and soul, and driven out<sup>7</sup> also, and afflicted.

7. And her that was cast off a strong nation. The prophecy, that there should be a remnant, was depressing. Yet what a remnant should it be! A remnant, which should multiply like the stars of heaven or the sand on the sea-shore. Israel had never been a strong nation, as a kingdom of this world. At its best estate, under David, it had subdued the petty nations around it, who were confederated to destroy it. It had never competed with the powers of this world, East or West, Egypt or Nineveh, although God had at times marvellously saved it from being swallowed up by them. Now, the remnant of Judah, which itself was but a remnant of the undivided people, was to become a strong nation. So Isaiah prophesied, "A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation". Plainly not in temporal greatness, both because human strength was not, and could not be, its characteristic, and because the Prophet had been speaking of spiritual restoration.

<sup>8</sup> Strong are they, whom neither torture nor allurements can separate from the love of Christ." "Strong are they, who are strong against themselves." Strong were they who said<sup>10</sup>, "We ought to obey God rather than men", and<sup>11</sup>, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us". God does not only restore in the Gospel; He multiplies exceedingly. <sup>12</sup> I will so clothe her with the spirit of might, that, as she shall be fruitful in number, so shall she be glorious in victories, so that of her it shall be a strong nation: and the Lord<sup>k</sup> shall reign over them in mount Zion from henceforth, even for ever.

We know that that remnant and strong nation owe wholly to grace all which they are, as they themselves in the Revelations give thanks; <sup>14</sup> "Thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by Thy Blood, out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth; that same Lord, of Whom it is here said,

The Lord shall reign over them in Zion from henceforth even for ever. The visible kingdom of God in Judah was often obscured, kings, princes, priests, and false prophets combining to encourage one another in rebellion against God. In the captivity it even underwent an almost total eclipse by the overshadowing of earthly power, save when the Divine light flashed forth for an instant in the deeds or words of power and wisdom, related by Daniel. Henceforth, i. e. from the time, when the law should go forth out of Zion, God should indeed reign, and that kingdom should have no end.

8. And thou, O tower of the flock. "Tower of Ader," which is interpreted "tower of the flock," about 1000 paces (a mile) from Bethlehem," says St. Jerome<sup>15</sup> who lived there, "and foreshadowing [in its very name] by a sort of prophecy the shepherds at the Birth of the Lord." There Jacob fed his sheep<sup>16</sup>, and there (since it was hard by Bethlehem) the shepherds, keeping watch over their flocks by night, saw and heard the Angels singing, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill towards men." The Jews inferred from this place that the Messiah should be revealed there<sup>17</sup>.

Stronghold [Ophel<sup>18</sup>] of the daughter of Zion. Ophel was a strong place in the South of Jerusalem, the last which the wall, enclosing Zion, reached, before, or as, it touched on the Eastern porch of the temple<sup>19</sup>, with whose service it was connected. We know that, after the captivity, the Nethinim, who did the laborious service of the temple, dwelt there<sup>20</sup>. It lay very near to the priests' district<sup>21</sup>. It was probably, a lower acclivity, "swelling out," (as its name seems to mean<sup>22</sup>) from the mountain of the temple. In the last war, it was held together with <sup>23</sup> the temple, and the adjoining parts to no slight extent, and the valley of Kedron." It was burnt<sup>24</sup> before the upper city was taken. It had been encircled by a wall of old; for Jotham <sup>25</sup> "built greatly upon its wall." Manasseh <sup>26</sup> "encircled it," (probably with an outer wall) "and raised it exceedingly," i.e. apparently raised artificially the whole level.

Yet, as a symbol of all Jerusalem, Ophel is as remarkable, as the "tower of the flock" is as to Bethlehem. For Ophel, although fortified, is no where spoken of, as of any account<sup>1</sup>. It is not even mentioned in the circuit of the walls, at their dedication under Nehemiah<sup>2</sup>, probably as an outlying spot. It was probably of moment chiefly, as giving an advantage to an enemy who might occupy it.

Both then are images of lowliness. The lonely Shepherd-tower, for Bethlehem, the birthplace of David; Ophel for Jerusalem, of which it was yet but an outlying part, and deriving its value probably as an outwork of the temple. Both symbols anticipate the fuller prophecy of the littleness, which shall become great in God. Before the mention of the greatness of the dominion to come, is set forth the future poverty to which it should come. In lowliness Christ came, yet is indeed a Tower protecting and defending the sheep of His pasture, founded on earth in His Human Nature, reaching to Heaven in His Divine; <sup>3</sup> a strong Tower; the righteous runneth into it, and is safe.

Unto thee shall it come; (lit. unto thee shall it come<sup>4</sup>, and there shall arrive &c.) He saith not at first what shall come, and so raises the soul to think of the greatness of that which should come. The soul is left to fill up what is more than thought can utter. Unto thee, (lit. quite up to thee<sup>5</sup>.) No hindrances should withhold it from coming. Seemingly it was a great way off, and they in a very hopeless state. He suggests the difficulty even by his strength of assurance. One could not say, it shall come quite up to thee, of that which in the way of nature would readily come to any one. But amid all hindrances God's Might makes its way, and brings His gifts and promises to their end. And there shall arrive. He twice repeats the assurance, in equivalent words, for their fuller assurance, "<sup>6</sup> to make the good tidings the gladder by repeating and enforcing them."

The first or former, dominion. The word often stands, as our, "former<sup>7</sup>," in contrast with the "later." It is not necessarily the first, strictly; and so here, not the dominion of David and Solomon exclusively. Rather the Prophet is placed in spirit in the later times when the kingdom should be suspended, and foretells that the former dominion, i.e. that of the line of David, should come to her, not in its temporal greatness, but the line itself. So the Angel said, He shall be great and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David, and He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever.

The [A] kingdom to the daughter of Jerusalem, i.e. a kingdom, which should not be of her, but which should come have taken thee as a woman in travail.

10 Be in pain, and labour to bring forth, O daughter of Zion, like a woman in travail: for now shalt thou go forth out of the city, and thou shalt dwell in the field, and thou shalt go even to Babylon;

to her: not her's by right, but by His right, Who should merit it for her, and, being King of kings, makes His own, kings and priests unto God and His Father.

The Jews themselves seem to have taken these words into their own mouths, just before they rejected Him, when they hoped that He would be a king, such as they wished for. Blessed be the kingdom of our father David that cometh in the Name of the Lord. And in a distorted form, they held it even afterwards<sup>11</sup>.

9. Now. The prophet places himself in the midst of their deepest sorrows, and out of them he promises comfort. Why dost thou cry out aloud? is there no King in thee? is thy Counsellor perished?<sup>12</sup> Is then all lost, because thou hast no visible king, none to counsel thee or consult for thee<sup>12</sup>? Very remarkably he speaks of their King and Counsellor as one, as if to say, 'When all besides is gone, there is One Who abides. Though thou be a captive, God will not forsake thee. When thou hadst no earthly king, <sup>13</sup> the Lord thy God was thy King. He is the First, and He is the Last. When thou shalt have no other, He, thy King, ceaseth not to be?' <sup>14</sup> Thou shouldst not fear, so long as He, Who counselleth for thee, liveth; but He liveth for ever. Thy Counsellor, He, Who is called <sup>15</sup> Counsellor, Who counselleth for thee, Who counselleth thee, will, if thou obey His counsel, make birth-pangs to end in joy.

For pangs have taken thee, as a woman in travail, restless, remediless, doubling the whole frame, redoubled until the end, for which God sends them, is accomplished, and then ceasing in joy. The truest comfort, amid all sorrow, is in owning that the travail-pains must be, but that the reward shall be afterwards. "<sup>16</sup> It is meet to look for deliverance from God's mercy, as certainly as for punishment from our guilt; and that the more, since He who foretold both, willingly saves, punishes unwillingly." So the prophet adds,

10. Be in pain, and labour to bring forth, (lit. Write and burst forth.) as if to say, 'thou must suffer, but thy suffering and thy joy shall be one. Thou canst not have the joy without the suffering. As surely as thou sufferest, thou shalt have joy. In all sorrow, lose not faith and hope, and <sup>17</sup> thou shalt be sorrowful, but thy sorrow shall be turned into joy.' <sup>18</sup> Good daughter, be very patient in the pangs, bear up against your sorrows," so shall the birth be nigh. Yet for the time she must go forth out of the city into captivity. And thou shalt dwell in the field, houseless, under tents, as captives were wont to be kept, until all were gathered together to be led away; a sore exchange for her former luxury, and in requital of their oppression<sup>19</sup>.

And thou shalt go even to Babylon. Not Babylon, but Assyria was the scourge of God in Micah's time. Babylon was scarcely known, a far country<sup>19</sup>. Yet Micah is taught of God to declare that thither shall the two tribes be carried captive, although the ten were carried captive by Assyria. There<sup>1</sup> shalt thou be delivered, there the Lord shall redeem thee from the hand<sup>2</sup> of thine enemies. God's judgments, or purifying trials, or visitation of His saints, hold their way, until their end be reached. They who suffer them cannot turn them aside; they who inflict them cannot add to them or detain them. The prison-house is the place of deliverance to Joseph and St. Peter; the Red-sea to Israel; the judges were raised up, when Israel was mightily oppressed; Jabesh-Gilead was delivered when the seventh day was come<sup>3</sup>; the walls of Jerusalem were the end of Sennacherib; Judah should have long been in the very hand and grasp of Babylon, yet must its clenched hand be opened.

11. Now also. [And now.] The prophet had already spoken of the future before them, with this word Now. Then, he distinctly prophesied the captivity to Babylon. Twice more he begins anew; as Holy Scripture, so often, in a mystery, whether speaking of evil or of good, of deliverance or of punishment, uses a threefold form. In these two, no mention is made of the enemy, and so there is some uncertainty. But the course must apparently be either backwards or forwards. They must either be two nearer futures before the Captivity, or two more distant after it. This second gathering might, in itself, either be that of the Assyrian hosts under Sennacherib out of all the nations subject to him; or that of the many petty nations in the time of the Maccabees, who took advantage of the Syrians' oppression, to combine to eradicate the Jews<sup>4</sup>. If understood of Sennacherib, the prophet, having foretold the entire captivity of the whole people to Babylon, would have prophesied the sudden destruction of a nearer enemy, whose miraculous and instantaneous overthrow should be the earnest of the destruction of Babylon and of their deliverance from it. This would suit well with the description, He shall gather them as sheaves to the floor, and would correspond well with the descriptions in Isaiah. On the other hand, whereas this description would suit any other event, in which man gathered his strength against God and was overthrown, the following words, Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion &c. fit better with the victories of the Maccabees, in which Israel was active, than with the overthrow of Sennacherib, in which they were wholly passive, and God did all for them, as Isaiah and Nahum foretell the same overthrow<sup>5</sup>. Then also, if the course of the description was backward, 1) the captivity in Babylon, 2) the destruction of Sennacherib, there is no earlier event to correspond with the smiting of the judge of Israel on the cheek. The malice also of the nations gathered against Zion suits better with the abiding character of the petty nations, and of their hereditary envy against Israel and its high claims. To Nineveh and Babylon, Israel was but one little corner of ground, which rounded their territory and connected them with Egypt. They disdained them, even while they sought to subdue them. Micah describes the exultation of petty gratified rivalry.

That say, let her be defiled. The bad have a keen eye for the haltings and inconsistencies and falls of God's people, for which they are ever on the watch. Like Satan, they are first tempters, then the accusers; first desecrators, then sanctionious justiciaries. God, in His judgment, leaves what has been inwardly defiled to be outwardly profaned. If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple are ye. The faithful city had become a harlot. The land had become polluted by its inhabitants. Now it was to be polluted by the enemy. Its seducers ask for the judgment of God. It has become like us in its deeds; let it no more be distinguished from us by the name of the people of God.

And let our eye look upon Zion, with pleasure upon its desolation, and feed itself with its misery. "Where the eye, there love; where the hand, there pain." They opened their mouth wide against me; they said, Aha, Aha, our eye hath seen. The world hates the Church; Edom, Israel; it cannot be satisfied with beholding its chastisements<sup>12</sup>. The sufferings of the Martyrs were the choice spectacle of the Heathen.

12. But they know not the thoughts of the Lord, neither understand they His counsel. The heathen did, for their own ends, what God willed for His. The first step was the same; God willed that His people should be punished; they willed to punish them. But all which lay beyond, they saw not; that God willed (on their repentance) to pardon His own people, but to punish themselves for their pride<sup>13</sup> and cruelty<sup>14</sup>. "Almighty God corrects the elect through the reprobate, as with a rod; after which He condemns the reprobate eternally, as when the son has been disciplined, the rod is cast into the fire."

For He shall gather them as the sheaves into the floor. The multitude of the sheaves hinders not the threshing; the multitude of God's enemies hinders not their destruction. They think that they strengthen themselves, as they gather together; God sees them but as ripened and fitted for destruction, gathered into one bundle together, to perish together. God gathers them, not by constraint or force, but by giving free scope to their own wayward wills, and overruling these to His ends.

13. Arise (it may be,) from the dust in which they were lying, I will make thine horn iron, and I will make thy hoofs brass. Threshing in the East is partly with oxen, partly with wheels of iron, or with planks set with sharp flints on an open place made hard to this end. The Prophet joins another image, with this and represents Judah as being by God endowed with strength, first as with a horn of iron<sup>15</sup> to cast the enemy to the ground, and then with hoofs of brass, wherewith to trample them to dust, as the stubble and chaff. And I will consecrate their gain unto the Lord, i. e. to Myself; the Lord gathered them into the floor by His Providence; the Lord gave His people strength to subdue them; and now, in His own Person, He says, I will complete My own work.

The very image of the "threshing" implies that this is no mere destruction. While the stubble is beaten or bruised to small pieces, and the chaff is far more than the wheat, and is carried out of the floor, there yet remains the seed-corn. So in the great judgments of God, while most is refuse, there yet remains over, what is severed from the lost heap and wholly consecrated to Him. Whatever things were the object of the "Cherem" <sup>1</sup> or "thing devoted to the Lord," could not be redeemed, but must remain wholly the Lord's. If it had life, it was to be put to death <sup>2</sup>. And so the use of the word here may the rather shew, how those converted to God, and who became gain, hallowed to Him, were to pass through death to life, to die to themselves that they might live to Him : what was evil was to be slain in them, that they themselves might live.

The Israelites and God's dealings with them are <sup>3</sup> examples of us upon whom the ends of the world are come. And so the whole section fits wonderfully with the condition of the single soul.

She who halteth is " <sup>4</sup> the soul, who would serve God, yet not so as wholly to give up the service of the world, which it had in Baptism renounced, who, after it had gone astray like a lost sheep, and been scattered amid the manifoldness of earthly things, was gathered again into the fold, to love One only, long for One only, give itself to One," its Good Shepherd, and over it the Lord reigneth for ever, if, taught by experience the deceitfulness of Satan's promises, and stung by the sense of its own thanklessness and vileness, and conscious of the peril of self confidence, it abideth more closely than others with God. He shall gather her that is driven out, i. e. " <sup>5</sup> He shall restore her, from whom He had, for the time, withdrawn His grace," and her that was afflicted, trouble being God's most effectual instrument, in recalling the soul to Himself. " <sup>6</sup> For the Lord raiseth them that are bowed down. And will make her that halteth, a remnant, placing her among the elect and holy, and her that was cast off strong; for Christ giveth oft to such souls great richness of Divine graces, so that <sup>7</sup> where sin abounded, grace should much more abound." " <sup>8</sup> To it, when enlightened and purified by affliction and by repentance, it is promised, that its Lord, the Great King, shall come to it, and again reign in it, which is the great bliss of souls in grace. For then doth the soul really reign, when it submits wholly to Christ, Whom to serve is to reign, and so, under Him, receives power to command its wrong desires, and rule itself;" that great and wonderful power which the Evangelist expresses in words so brief, " <sup>9</sup> To them gave He power to become the sons of God. Thus He maketh it strong, so that <sup>10</sup> neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, can separate it from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Then, "he describes the condition of the soul fluctuating between good and evil, called one way by God through inward inspirations, and another way by the enticements and habits of sin. And, wishing to follow God, yet not to be without its sinful pleasures, and knowing this to be impossible, it is in anguish and hesitates. Her the prophet justly rebukes, " why thus cry aloud, as though thou must be led captive by the Devil, not knowing or unable to extricate thyself? Hast thou no King, aided by Whose power, thou mayest fight against all enticements, habit, the flesh? Paul felt this and cried aloud, " I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? " You see his grief. But he despairs not. He knows that he has a King. I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Or why grieveest thou, as if thou hadst no counsellor, by whose counsels to free thee from these snares? Thy Counsellor indeed perished on the Cross, but for thy sake, that thou mayest live. He died, to destroy him who hath the power of death. But He rose the third day and is still with thee; at the Right Hand of the Father He still reigns Immortal for ever. See how many counsels He has left thee in the Gospel, how many admonitions, whereby thou mayest lead a happy and tranquil life. Now pain seizes thee like a woman in travail. For such a soul travails, having conceived inspirations from God, which it wishes to obey, but that the flesh, overcome by concupiscence, resists, and so it never brings forth, nor experiences that joy, whereof the Lord speaketh, " When she is delivered of the child, she remembereth no more the anguish, for joy that a man is born into the world. Wherefore he adds; he is in pain, for thou art indeed in travail; thou wilt not cease to be in pain, until thou bring forth. Thou wilt go forth &c. " <sup>11</sup> God, by a provision of His great mercy, allows lukewarm souls, who will be at no pains to gain grace, to fall into foulest sins, in order that, owning at last their misery, they may cease to be lukewarm, and with great ardor of soul may embrace virtue. For, warned by the result, they understand that they themselves emboldened the tempter, (for he chiefly attacks the lukewarm and remiss,) and they become ardent in the conflict and in well-doing." Wherefore he says, thou shalt go forth out of the city, that City of God, whereof He is the Builder and Maker <sup>12</sup>, which is gladdened by the river of His Spirit; "and it dwells in the open field, unprotected, ready to be a prey, in the broad way of its own concupiscences, out of the narrow road which leadeth to life, and goeth even to Babylon, the city of 'confusion,' in tumult and din and unrest, and the distractions of this life. Yet even there shall it be delivered, like the poor Prodigal, who came to himself in a far country, when worn out by its hard service. Even there it must not despair, but remember, with him, its Father's house, its former home, the Heavenly Jerusalem. Its pains within or without, whereby it is brought back, are travail-pains. Though all is dark, it must not say, I have no Counsellor. For its Redeemer's Name is <sup>13</sup> Counsellor, " <sup>14</sup> one Counsellor of a thousand." " <sup>15</sup> Thine Intercessor never dies." Out of the very depth of misery will the Divine Mercy draw thee. Though thou seem held by the strong hand of the enemy, and he seems to triumph over thee and to jeer thee,

CHAPTER V.

1 The birth of Christ. 4 His kingdom. 8 His conquest.

NOW gather thyself in troops O daughter of troops: he hath laid <sup>1</sup> There, there so would we have it, we have devoured him, and hosts of devils seek thy utter destruction, and thou seem to be delivered over to them to the destruction of the flesh; yet is it only that the spirit may be saved in the Day of the Lord. Even Satan, when he is tormenting souls, knows not the thoughts of the Lord, nor understands His counsels, how, by the very pain which he inflicts, God is bidding them, Rise and "look up to heaven and long for heavenly things and trample on all which they had hitherto foully served, honor or vain glory or covetousness or lust;" how He will exalt their horn in the Lord, make it strong as iron that they should do all things through Christ instrengthening them, and conquer all through the might of Christ; how He should bruise Satan under their feet shortly, and they consecrate wholly to God their whole strength, every power of soul and body which hitherto had been the adversary's.

v. 1. Now gather thyself in troops, O daughter of troops. The daughter of troops is still the same who was before addressed, Judah. The word is almost always <sup>4</sup> used of "bands of men employed in irregular, marauding, inroads." Judah is entitled daughter of troops, on account of her violence, the robbery and bloodshed within her <sup>5</sup>, as Jeremiah says <sup>6</sup>, Is this house which is called by My Name become a den of robbers in your eyes? She then who had spoiled <sup>7</sup> should now be spoiled; she who had formed herself in bands to lay waste, shall now be gathered thick together, in small bands <sup>8</sup>, unable to resist in the open field; yet in vain should she so gather herself; for the enemy was upon her, in her last retreat.

This description has obviously no fulfilment, except in the infliction by the Romans. For there was no event, before the invasion by Sennacherib and accordingly in the prophet's own time, in which there is any seeming fulfilment of it. But then, the second deliverance must be that by the Maccabees; and this siege, which lies, in order of time, beyond it, must be a siege by the Romans. With this it agrees, that whereas, in the two former visitations, God promised, in the first, deliverance, in the second, victory, here the Prophet dwells on the Person of the Redeemer, and foretells that the strength of the Church should not lie in any human means <sup>9</sup>. Here too Israel had no king, but a judge only. Then the "gathering in robber-bands" strikingly describes their internal state in the siege of Jerusalem; and although this was subsequent to and consequent upon the rejection of our Lord, yet there is no reason why the end should be separated from the beginning since the capture by Titus was but the sequel of the capture by Pompey, the result of that same temper, in which they crucified Jesus, because He would not be their earthly king. It was the close of the organic existence of the former people; after which the remnant from among them with the Gentiles, not Israel after the flesh, were the true people of God.

2 But thou, <sup>b</sup> Beth-lehem Eph-ratah though thou be little

He hath laid siege against us. The Prophet, being born of them, and for the great love he bore them, counts himself among them, as St. Paul mourns over his brethren after the flesh. They shall smite the judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek. So St. Paul said to him who had made himself high priest, <sup>10</sup> God shall smite thee, thou whited wall; for sittest thou to judge me after the law, and commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law. It is no longer "the king" (for they had said, <sup>11</sup> We have no King but Caesar) but the judge of Israel, they who against Christ and His Apostles gave wrong judgment. As they had smitten contrary to the law, so were the chief men smitten by Titus, when the city was taken. As they had done, it was done unto them. To be smitten on the face, betokens shame; to smite with the rod, betokens destruction. Now both shall meet in one; as, in the Great Day, the wicked <sup>12</sup> shall awake to shame and everlasting contempt, and shall perish for ever.

2. But [And] thou, Bethlechem Ephratah. With us, the chequered events of time stand in strong contrast, painful or gladdening. Good seems to efface evil, or evil blots out the memory of the good. God orders all in the continuous course of His Wisdom. All lies in perfect harmony in the Divine Mind. Each event is the sequel of what went before. So here the Prophet joins on, what to us stands in such contrast, with that simple, And. Yet he describes the two conditions as bearing on one another. He had just spoken of the judge of Israel smitten on the cheek, and, before <sup>13</sup>, that Israel had neither king nor counsellor; he now speaks of the Ruler in Israel, the Everlasting. He had said, how Judah was to become mere hands of men; he now says, how the little Bethlechem was to be exalted. He had said before, that the rule of old was to come to the tower of the flock, the daughter of Jerusalem; now, retaining the word <sup>14</sup>, he speaks of the Ruler, in Whom it was to be established. Before he had addressed the tower of the flock; now, Bethlechem. But he has greater things to say now, so he pauses <sup>15</sup>, And thou! People have admired the brief appeal of the murdered Caesar, "Thou too, Brutus." The like energetic conciseness lies in the words, And thou! Bethlechem Ephratah. The name Ephratah is not seemingly added, in order to distinguish Bethlechem from the Bethlechem of Zabulon, since that is but once named <sup>16</sup>, and Bethlechem here is marked to be the Bethlechem Judah <sup>17</sup>, by the addition, too little to be among the thousands of Judah. He joins apparently the usual name, Bethlechem, with the old Patriarchal, and perhaps poetic <sup>18</sup> name, Ephratah, either in reference and contrast to that former birth of sorrow near Ephratah <sup>19</sup>, or, (as is Micah's wont,) regarding the meaning of both names. Both its names were derived from "fruitfulness;" "House of Bread" and "fruitfulness;" and, despite of centuries of Mohammedan oppression, it is fertile still <sup>20</sup>.

It had been rich in the fruitfulness of this world; rich, thrice rich, should it be in spiritual fruitfulness. "1 Truly is Bethlehem, 'house of bread,' where was born<sup>2</sup> the Bread of life, which came down from heaven," "3 Who with inward sweetness refreshes the minds of the elect," "4 Angel's Bread, and "5 Ephratah, fruitfulness, whose fruitfulness is God," the Seed-corn, stored wherein, died and brought forth much fruit, all which ever was brought forth to God in the whole world."

Though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, lit. small to be, i. e. too small to be among &c. Each tribe was divided into its thousands, probably of fighting men, each thousand having its own separate head<sup>6</sup>. But the thousand continued to be a division of the tribe, after Israel was settled in Canaan<sup>7</sup>. The thousand of Gideon was the meanest in Manasseh<sup>8</sup>. Places too small to form a thousand by themselves were united with others, to make up the number<sup>9</sup>. So lowly was Bethlehem that it was not counted among the possessions of Judah. In the division under Joshua, it was wholly omitted<sup>10</sup>. From its situation, Bethlehem can never have been a considerable place. It lay and lies, East of the road from Jerusalem to Hebron, at six miles from the capital<sup>11</sup>. It was "12 seated on the summit-level of the hill country of Judaea with deep gorges descending East to the Dead Sea and West to the plains of Philistia," "2704 feet above the sea<sup>13</sup>," "14 a ridge," whose whole length was not above a mile<sup>15</sup>, swelling at each extremity into a somewhat higher eminence, with a slight depression between<sup>16</sup>. "17 The ridge projects Eastward from the central mountain range, and breaks down in abrupt terraced slopes to deep valleys on the N. E. and S." The West end too "18 shelves gradually down to the valley." It was then rather calculated to be an outlying fortress, guarding the approach to Jerusalem, than for a considerable city. As a garrison, it was fortified and held by the Philistines<sup>17</sup> in the time of Saul, recovered from them by David, and was one of the 15 cities<sup>18</sup> fortified by Rehoboam. Yet it remained an unimportant place. Its inhabitants are counted with those of the neighbouring Netophah, both before<sup>19</sup> and after<sup>20</sup> the captivity, but both together amounted after the captivity to 179<sup>21</sup> or 188<sup>22</sup> only. It still does not appear among the possessions of Judah<sup>23</sup>. It was called a city<sup>24</sup>, but the name included even places which had only 100 fighting men<sup>25</sup>. In our Lord's times it is called a village<sup>26</sup>, a city<sup>26</sup>, or a strong spot<sup>27</sup>. The royal city would become a den of thieves. Christ should be born in a lowly village. "28 He Who had taken the form of a servant, chose Bethlehem for His Birth, Jerusalem for His Passion."

St. Matthew relates how the Chief Priest and Scribes in their answer to Herod's enquiries, where Christ should be born<sup>29</sup>, alleged this prophecy. They gave the substance rather than the exact words, and with one remarkable variation, art not the least among the princes of Judah. St. Matthew did not correct their paraphrase, because it does not affect the object for which they alleged the prophecy, the birth of the Redeemer in Bethlehem. The sacred writers often do not correct the translations, existing in their time, when the variations do not affect the truth<sup>30</sup>. Both words are true here. Micah speaks of Bethlehem, as it was in the sight of men; the chief priests, whose words St. Matthew approves, speak of it as it was in the sight of God, and as, by the Birth of Christ, it should become. "31 Nothing hindered that Bethlehem should be at once a small village and the Mother-city of the whole earth, as being the mother and nurse of Christ Who made the world and conquered it." "32 That is not the least, which is the house of blessing, and the receptacle of Divine grace." "33 He saith that the spot, although mean and small, shall be glorious. And in truth," adds S. Chrysostom, "the whole world came together to see Bethlehem, where, being born, He was laid, on no other ground than this only." "34 O Bethlehem, little, but now made great by the Lord, He hath made thee great, Who, being great, was in thee made <sup>28</sup> See ab. on Am ix. 12. p. 224. Pococke has employed much learning to make this passage verbally accord with the allegation of it by the chief priest recorded by S. Matthew (Note miscell. on the Porta Mosis, Works i. 134 9.) He follows the eminent authority of Abulwaid (followed by R. Tanchum and a Hebr. Arab. Gloss.) supposing צער, "little," to have had the opposite sense of "great," and that it actually had that meaning in Jer. xlviii. 4. Zech. xiii. 7. In neither of these passages, however, have צער, צער, that meaning, nor do the cases alleged of words containing opposite meanings bear out such an one as this. For the two senses, although differing at last, can be traced up to one common source, which could not be done as to צר, צר, "holy," is used of idolatrous consecrations which were in fact horrible desecrations, (see ab. on Hos. iv. 14. p. 31.) צר, "soul," is used of the "person," as we speak of "1000 souls." Thence the idiom צר, צר, lit. "the soul of one dead," Lev. xxi. 11. Num. vi. 6; then in one idiom צר, צר, "defiled as to the dead," and צר, צר does not signify one alive or dead differently. 3) צר, צר, lit. "bent the knee," prayed, includes prayers for evil as well as for good, cursing as well as blessing. 4) צר, צר love, piety, hence perhaps, what is forbidden by natural piety, (Lev. xv. 17.) and a reproach. (Prov. xiv. 31. Ib. xxv. 10.) unless different roots have accidentally coalesced, (see Furst Conc. jas in צר, to use "insight," hence wisdom, and צר, vacillate, hence folly, meet in one Syriac word; or our let, "binder," is from lara, "slow," latyan, "retard;" Goth. our let, "allow," from "letan" i. q. lassen.) In Arabic this is the more common on account of the reverence of the different tribes who spoke it, before Mohammed united them into one, as the same word receives modifications in different languages of Europe. The meaning, "great" also, if it could be obtained for צער, would still not yield the meaning desired. For צער implies a comparison. It means little to be in the thousands of Judah i. e. too little. צער were rendered great, it would still be "great to be among the thousands" &c. i. e. too great to be. Child. Lxx. Syr. and the Latin in S. Aug. de Civ. D. xviii. 30. give another explanation, it is little that thou shouldst be. This does not agree better with the words in St. Matthew, and is against the idiom. In this idiom צער is not used, but מוט, מוט, or מוט, מוט, 6. or קטן 2 Sam. vii. 19. 2) The person spoken to is always expressly. <sup>29</sup> S. Greg. Naz. Orat. 18. in patr. § 17. <sup>30</sup> S. short of that meaning; and so it declares the eternal going-forth, or Generation of the Son. The plural, goings forth, may here be used, either as words of great majesty<sup>1</sup>, "God," "Lord," "Wisdom," (i. e. Divine<sup>1</sup>) are plural; or because the Generation of the Son from the Father is an Eternal Generation, before all time, and now, though not in time, yet in eternity still. As then the prophet saith, "from the days of eternity," although eternity has no parts, nor beginning, nor "from," so he may say goings forth, to convey, as we can receive it, a continual going-forth. We think of Eternity as unending, continual, time; and so he may have set forth to us the Eternal Act of the Going Forth of the Son, as continual acts.

The Jews understood, as we do now, that Micah foretold that the Christ was to be born at Bethlehem, until they rejected Him, and were pressed by the argument. Not only did the chief priests formally give the answer, but, supposing our Lord to be of Nazareth, some who rejected Him, employed the argument against Him. <sup>2</sup> Some said, Shall Christ come out of Galilee? <sup>3</sup> Hath not the Scripture said, that Christ cometh of the seed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem, where David was? They knew of two distinct things; that Christ was 1) to be of the seed of David; and 2) out of the town of Bethlehem. Christians urged them with the fact, that the prophecy could be fulfilled in no other than in Christ. <sup>4</sup> If He is not yet born, who is to go forth as a Ruler out of the tribe of Judah, from Bethlehem, (for He must needs come forth out of the tribe of Judah and from Bethlehem, but we see that now no one of the race of Israel has remained in the city of Bethlehem, and thenceforth it has been interdicted<sup>5</sup> that any Jew should remain in the confines of that country) —how then shall a Ruler be born from Judaea, and how shall he come forth out of Bethlehem, as the Divine volumes of the Prophets announce, when to this day there is no one whatever left there of Israel, from whose race Christ could be born? The Jews at first met the argument, by affirming that the Messiah was born at Bethlehem on the day of the destruction of the temple<sup>6</sup>; but was hidden for the sins of the people. This being a transparent fable, the Jews had either to receive Christ, or to give up the belief that He was to be born at Bethlehem. So they explained it, "The Messiah shall go forth thence, because he shall be of the seed of David who was out of Bethlehem." But this would have been misleading language. Never did man so speak, that one should be born in a place, when only a remote ancestor had been born there. Micah does not say merely, that His family came out of Bethlehem, but that He Himself should thereafter come forth thence. No one could have said of Solomon or of any of the subsequent kings of Judah, that they should thereafter come forth from Bethlehem, any more than they could now say, "one shall come forth from Corsica," of any future sovereign of the line of Napoleon III, because the first Napoleon was a Corsican; or to us, "one shall come out of Hanover," of a successor to the present dynasty, born in England, because George I. came from Hanover in 1714.

3. Therefore, since God has so appointed both to punish and to redeem, He, God, or the Ruler "Whose goings forth have been from of old from everlasting," Who is God with God, shall give them up, i. e. withdraw His protection and the nearness of His Presence, giving them up 1) into the hands of their enemies. And indeed the far greater part never returned from the captivity, but remained, although willingly, in the enemy's land, outwardly shut out from the land of the promise and the hope of their fathers<sup>6</sup>. But also, 2) all were, more than before, <sup>7</sup> given up, to follow their own ways. God was less visibly present among them. Prophecy ceased soon after the return from the captivity, and many tokens of the nearness of God and means of His communications with them, the Ark and the Urim and Thummim were gone. It was a time of pause and waiting, wherein the fulness of God's gifts was withdrawn, that they might look on to Him Who was to come. Until the time that she which travaileth hath brought forth, i. e. until <sup>b</sup> the Virgin who should conceive and bear a Son and call His Name Emmanuel, God with us, shall give birth to Him Who shall save them. And then shall be Redemption and joy and assured peace. God provides against the fainting of hearts in the long time before our Lord should come.

Then [And.] There is no precise mark of time such as our word then expresses. He speaks generally of what should be after the Birth of the Redeemer. The remnant of His brethren shall return unto the children of Israel. The children of Israel are the true Israel, Israelites indeed<sup>9</sup>; they who are such, not in name<sup>10</sup> only, but indeed and in truth. His brethren are plainly the brethren of the Christ; either because Jesus vouchsafed to be born <sup>11</sup> of the seed of David according to the flesh, and of them <sup>12</sup> as concerning the flesh Christ came, Who is over all, God blessed for ever; or as such as He makes and accounts and <sup>13</sup> is not ashamed to call, brethren, being sons of God by grace, as He is the Son of God by nature. As He says, <sup>14</sup> Who-soever shall do the will of My Father which is in Heaven, the same is My brother and sister and mother; and, <sup>15</sup> My brethren are these who hear the word of God and do it. The residue of these, the Prophet says, shall return to, so as to be joined with<sup>16</sup>, the children of Israel; as Malachi prophesies, <sup>17</sup> He shall bring back the heart of the fathers to <sup>18</sup> the children, and the heart of the children to <sup>19</sup> the fathers. In the first sense, Micah foretells the continual inflow of the Jews to that true Israel who should give them up" and as "the children of Israel," so that a figurative mention of them in between would be unsuited to the context.

In all the cases mentioned by Furst, (Conc. p. 1109-11,) the original idea "over" remains in some force; "the waters returned upon the Eg," Ex. xiv. 26, "and they returned unto Pihahiroth (encamping there), Num. xxxiii. 7, "man would return to the dust," (so as to dwell there,) Job xxxiv. 15, "the dog returned to his vomit, (taking it up again.) So, whereas, since Solomon, all had been discord, and, at last, the Jews were scattered abroad every where, all, in the true Prince of Peace, shall be one<sup>1</sup>. This has been fulfilled in each generation since our Lord came, and shall be yet further in the end, when they shall haste and pour into the Church, and so all Israel shall be saved<sup>2</sup>.

But “<sup>3</sup> the promise of God was not only to Israel after the flesh, but to all” also that were afar off, even as many as the Lord our God should call<sup>4</sup>. All these may be called the remnant of His brethren, even those that were, before, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and afar off<sup>5</sup>, but now, in Christ Jesus, made one with them; all, brethren among themselves and to Christ their ruler. “<sup>6</sup> Having taken on Him their nature in the flesh, He is not ashamed to call them so, as the Apostle speaketh, confirming it out of the Psalm, where in the Person of Christ he saith<sup>6</sup>, I will declare Thy name unto My brethren. There is no reason to take the name, brethren, here in a narrower sense than so to comprehend all <sup>7</sup>the remnant whom the Lord shall call, whether Jews or Gentiles. The word “brethren” in its literal sense includes both, and, as to both, the words were fulfilled.

4. And He shall stand. The Prophet continues to speak of personal acts of this Ruler Who was to be born. He was not to pass away, not to rule only by others, but by Himself. To stand is the attitude of a servant, as Jesus, although God and Lord of all, said of Himself, He shall come forth and serve them; <sup>8</sup>The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. He shall stand as a Shepherd<sup>9</sup>, to watch, feed, guard them, day and night; He shall stand, as St. Stephen saw Christ <sup>10</sup>standing on the Right Hand of God, <sup>11</sup>to succour all those who suffer for Him. “<sup>12</sup> For to sit belongs to one judging; to stand, to one fighting or helping.” He shall stand, as abiding, not to pass from them, as Himself saith, <sup>13</sup>Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world; and He shall feed His flock by His Spirit, His Word, His Wisdom and doctrine, His example and life; yea by His own Body and Blood<sup>14</sup>. They whom He feedeth<sup>15</sup> lack nothing.

In the strength of the Lord. He, Who feedeth them with Divine tenderness, shall also have Divine might, His Father’s and His own, to protect them; as He saith, <sup>16</sup>My sheep hear My Voice, and I know them and they follow Me, neither shall any man pluck them out of My Hand. My Father Which gave them Me is greater than all, and no man is able to pluck them out of My Father’s Hand. I and My Father are One. With authority, it is said<sup>17</sup>, He commandeth even the unclean spirits and they come out. His feeding or teaching also was<sup>18</sup> with authority, and not as the scribes.

While I was with them in the world, I kept them in Thy Name. “<sup>23</sup>Whoever then is set to feed His flock must stand, i. e. be firm and unshaken; feed, not sell, nor slay; and feed in might, i. e. in Christ.” His God, as our Lord Himself, as Man, saith, <sup>24</sup>Unto My Father, and your Father, and to My God and your God. But that Majesty He Himself wields, as no mere man can; He Himself is invested with it. “<sup>25</sup>To ordinary kings God is strength<sup>26</sup>, or gives strength<sup>27</sup>; men have strength in God; this Ruler is clad in the strength of the Lord, that same strength, which the Lord hath, Whose is strength. He is invested with the strength of the Lord, because He is Man; as Man, He can be invested with the whole strength of the Lord, only because He is also God.”

And they shall abide (lit. sit, dwell) in rest and security and unbroken peace under Christ their Shepherd and their King; they shall not wander to and fro as heretofore. “<sup>29</sup>He, their Shepherd, shall stand; they shall sit.” “The word<sup>30</sup> is the more emphatic, because it stands so absolutely. This will be a sitting or dwelling, which will indeed deserve the name. The original promise, so often forfeited by their disobedience, should be perfectly fulfilled; <sup>31</sup>and ye shall dwell in your land safely, and I will give peace in the land, and ye shall lie down, and none shall make you afraid. So Amos and Micah had before promised.<sup>32</sup> And this is the result of the greatness of the promised Ruler, as the like promise of the Psalm is rested on the immutability of God<sup>33</sup>; Thou art the Same, and Thy years shall have no end. The children of Thy servants shall dwell<sup>34</sup>, and their seed shall be established before Thee. For it follows,

Shall He be great unto the [very<sup>35</sup>] ends of the earth, embracing them in His rule. (as David and Solomon had foretold<sup>36</sup>), and so none shall harm those whom He, the King of all the earth, shall protect. The universality of protection is derived from an universality of power. To David God says, <sup>37</sup>I have made thee a great name, like the name of the great that are in the earth. Of Uzziah it is said<sup>38</sup>, His name went forth far; for he was marvellously helped, until he was strong; but of the Messiah alone it is said, that His power should reach to the ends of the earth ; as God prophesies of Himself, that His <sup>1</sup> Name should be great among the Heathen. So Gabriel said to His Mother, <sup>2</sup> This, Whom she should bear, shall be great.

5. And this Man shall be the Peace. This, emphatically, i. e. "This Same," as is said of Noah, <sup>3</sup> This same shall comfort us, or, in the song of Moses, of the Lord, <sup>4</sup> This Same is my God. Of Him he saith, not only that He brings peace, but that He Himself <sup>5</sup> is that Peace ; as St. Paul saith, <sup>6</sup> He is our Peace, and Isaiah calls Him <sup>7</sup> the Prince of peace, and at His Birth the heavenly host proclaimed <sup>8</sup> peace on earth ; and He <sup>9</sup> preached peace to you which were afar off, and to them that were nigh ; and on leaving the world He saith, <sup>10</sup> Peace I leave with you, My Peace I give unto you. He shall be our Peace, within by His Grace, without by His Protection. <sup>11</sup> "Wouldst thou have peace with God, thine own soul, thy neighbour ? Go to Christ Who is our Peace," and follow the footsteps of Christ. "Ask peace of Him Who is Peace. Place Christ in thy heart and thou hast placed Peace there."

When the Assyrian shall come into our land, and when he shall tread in our palaces. Assur stands for the most powerful and deadliest foe, "ghostly and bodily," as the Assyrian then was of the people of God. For since this plainly relates to the time after Christ's coming, and, (to say the least,) after the captivity in Babylon and deliverance <sup>12</sup> from it, which itself followed the dissolution of the Assyrian Empire, the Assyrians cannot be the literal people, who had long since ceased to be <sup>13</sup>. In Isaiah too the Assyrian is the type of Anti-Christ and of Satan <sup>14</sup>. As Christ is our Peace, so one enemy is chosen to represent all enemies who <sup>15</sup> vex the Church, whether the human agents or Satan who stirs them up and uses them. "By the Assyrian," says St. Cyril, "he here means no longer a man out of Babylon, but rather marks out the inventor of sin, Satan. Or rather, to speak fully, the implacable multitude of devils, which spiritually ariseth against all which is holy, and fights against the holy city, the spiritual Zion, whereof the Divine Psalmist saith, Glorious things are spoken of thee, thou city of God. For Christ dwelleth in the Church, and maketh it, as it were, His own city, although by His Godhead filling all things. This city of God then is a sort of land and country of the sanctified and of those enriched in spirit, in unity with God. When then the Assyrian shall come against our city, i. e. when barbarous and hostile powers fight against the saints, they shall not find it unguarded." The enemy may tread on the land and on its palaces, i. e. lay low outward glory, vex the body which is of earth and the visible temple of the Holy Ghost, as he did St. Paul by the thorn in the flesh, the minister of Satan to buffet him, or Job in mind body or estate, but <sup>16</sup> after that he has no more that he can do ; he cannot hurt the soul, because nothing can separate us from the love of Christ, and <sup>17</sup> Christ Who is our Peace is in us ; and of the saint too it may be said, <sup>18</sup> The enemy cannot hurt him. <sup>19</sup> Much as the Church has been vexed at all times by persecutions of devils and of tyrants, Christ has ever consoled her and given her peace in the persecutions themselves : <sup>20</sup> Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we are comforted of God. For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ. The Apostles <sup>21</sup> departed from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for His Name. And St. Paul writeth to the Hebrews, <sup>22</sup> ye had compassion of me in my bonds, and took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing that ye have in heaven a better and more enduring substance.

Then shall we raise against him seven shepherds and eight principal men (lit. anointed, although elsewhere used of heathen princes.)

The shepherds are manifestly inferior, spiritual, shepherds, acting under the One Shepherd, by His authority, and He in them. The princes of men are most naturally a civil power, according to its usage elsewhere <sup>23</sup>. The seven is throughout the Old Testament a symbol of a sacred whole, probably of the union of God with the world <sup>24</sup>, reconciled with it ; eight, when united with it, is something beyond it <sup>25</sup>. Since then seven denotes a great, complete, and sacred multitude, by the eight he would designate "an incredible and almost countless multitude." <sup>26</sup> So in defence of the Church, there shall be raised up very many shepherds and teachers (for at no time will it be forsaken by Christ ;) yea by more and more, countless, so that, however persecutions may increase, there shall never be wanting more to teach, and exhort to, the faith."

6. And they shall waste, lit. feed on, and so eat up. They who were shepherds of their own people, should consume their enemies. Jeremiah uses the same image. <sup>27</sup> The shepherds with their flocks shall come unto her ; they shall pitch tents against her round about ; they shall feed, each his space. So Joshua and Caleb say, <sup>28</sup> They, (the inhabitants of Canaan,) are bread for us. So it was said to St. Peter, <sup>29</sup> Arise, Peter, kill and eat ; and what once was common, defiled and unclean, shall turn to the nourishment and growth of the Church, and be incorporated into Christ, being made part of His Body.

solution of the land, (vii. 13.) says, "He will turn again, He will have compassion upon us." (Ib. vii. 19.) nay, as our Lord Himself says to the Apostles, "I am with you always, even to the end of the world" (S. Matt. xxviii. 20.) i. e. with them and their successors to the end of time ; so Micah, who had sorrowed with his people in their sorrows, (i. 8. 10.) here rejoices with them in a deliverance far away, after God should for a long time have given them up, v. 3. and which he should not see. Assyria with the sword and the land of

And the land of Nimrod. Babylon, which should displace Assyria, but should carry on its work of chastising God's people, is joined by Micah, as by Isaiah<sup>1</sup>, as an object of His judgment. In Isaiah, they are the actual Assyria<sup>2</sup> and Babylon<sup>3</sup> whose destruction is foretold, yet so as to shadow out rebellion against God in its intensest form, making itself independent of, or measuring itself against, God. Hence, probably, here alone in holy Scripture, Babylon is called the land of Nimrod, as indeed he founded it<sup>4</sup>, but therewith was the author of the tower of Babel also, which was built in rebellion against God, whence his own name was derived<sup>5</sup>. Assyria then, and the world-empire which should succeed it, stand as representing the God-opposed world.

In the entrances thereof. [lit. in the gates thereof.<sup>6</sup>] The shepherds of Israel shall not act on the defensive only, but shall have victory over the world and Satan, carrying back the battle into his own dominions, and overthrowing him there. Satan's malice, so far from hurting the Church, shall turn to its good. Wherein he hoped to waste it, he shall be wasted; wherein he seemed to triumph, he shall be foiled. So it has been ever seen, how, under every persecution, the Church grew. "The more it was pressed down, the more it rose up and flourished;" "Shivering the assault of the Pagans, and strengthened more and more, not by resisting, but by enduring." Yet all, by whomsoever done, shall be the work of Christ Alone, enduring in martyrs, teaching in pastors, converting through the Apostles of Heathen nations. Wherefore he adds;

Thus, [And] He shall deliver us from the Assyrian. Not they, the subordinate shepherds, but He, the Chief Shepherd until the last enemy shall be destroyed and death shall be swallowed up in victory, shall deliver, whether by them or by Himself as He often so doth,—not us only (the saying is the larger because unlimited) but—He shall deliver, absolutely. Whosoever shall be delivered, He shall be their deliverer; all, whom He Alone knoweth, Who Alone<sup>7</sup> knoweth them that are His.<sup>8</sup> Neither is there salvation in any other.<sup>9</sup> Whoso glorieth, let him glory in the Lord. Every member of Christ has part in this, who, through the grace of God, "has power and strength to have victory and to triumph against the devil, the world, and the flesh"—not he, but the grace of God which is with him; and much more, all, whether Apostles or Apostolic men, or Pastors, or Bishops and Overseers, who, by preaching or teaching or prayer, bring those to the knowledge of the truth, who<sup>12</sup> sat in darkness and the shadow of death, and by whom<sup>13</sup> God translates us into the kingdom of His dear Son.

grass, that tarrieth not for man, nor wait-eth for the sons of men.

iah<sup>15</sup>, had prophesied, that a remnant only should return unto the Mighty God. These, though very many in themselves, are yet but a remnant only of the unconverted mass; yet this, the remnant, who shall be saved, who believe in Christ, the little flock, of whom were the Apostles and their disciples, shall be, in the midst of many people, whom they won to the faith, as John in Asia, Thomas in India, Peter in Babylon and Rome, Paul well-nigh in the whole world, what? something to be readily swallowed up by their multitude? No, but as a dew from the Lord, as the showers from the grass, which tarrieth not for man, nor waiteth for the sons of men, quickening to life that, which, like soon-withered<sup>16</sup> grass, no human cultivation, no human help, could reach.

In the Gospel and the grace of Christ there are both, gentleness and might; softness, as the dew, might as of a lion. For "Wisdom reacheth from one end to another mightily; and sweetly doth she order all things." The dew is, in Holy Scripture, a symbol of Divine doctrine. "My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass." The dew comes down from heaven, is of heavenly not of earthly birth, transparent, glistening with light, reflecting the hues of heaven, gentle, slight, weak in itself, refreshing, cooling the strong heats of the day<sup>21</sup>, consumed itself, yet thereby preserving life, falling on the dry and withered grass wherein all nature droops, and recalling it to freshness of life. And still more in those lands, where from the beginning of April to the end of October<sup>22</sup>, the close of the latter and the beginning of the early rain, during all the hot months of summer, the life of all herbage depends upon the dew alone<sup>23</sup>. Showers<sup>24</sup> are so called from the "multitude" of drops, slight and of no account in themselves, descending noiselessly yet penetrating the more deeply. So did the Apostles "bedew the souls of believers with the word of godliness and enrich them abundantly with the words of the Gospel," themselves dying, and the Church living the more through their death<sup>26</sup>, quenching the fiery heat of passions, and watering the dry and barren soil, that it might bring forth fruits unto Christ. Yet, they say<sup>27</sup>, the excellency of the power was of God and not of us, and God gave the increase. For neither was their doctrine<sup>29</sup> of man nor by man; but it came from heaven, the Holy Spirit teaching them invisibly and making unlearned and ignorant men mighty in word and deed. "Whence these and these alone the Church of Christ looks up to, as furnishing the rule of truth." "The herb, upon which this dew falleth, groweth to God without any aid of man, and flourisheth, and needeth neither doctrines of philosophers, nor the rewards or praises of men."

<sup>6</sup> The E. V. has followed the analogy of the "Caspian pylæ," &c. and has paraphrased, "or enings" or "gates" by "entrances," as if they were "the gates of the country;" which, however, belongs only to narrow entrances, such as Thermopylæ. The rendering in the E. M. "with their own drawn swords," (from Aq. and Ed. v. A. E. and Kim.) is owing to a slavish adherence to parallelism, מִסַּבְּרִים, &c. "drawn swords," (Ps. lv. 22.) is fem. after the analogy of אֶרֶץ itself. The uniform meaning of מִסַּבְּרִים "opening," "door," "port," "gate," is plainly not to be deserted in a single case, on the ground of parallelism only. The fem. אֶרֶץ, also belongs naturally to the land, her's, not their's, i. e. the people's.

8. And the remnant of Jacob shall be as a young lion. <sup>1</sup>What more unlike than the sweetness of the dew and the fierceness of the lion? What so different as the gentle shower distilling on the herb, and the savageness or vehemence of a lion roaring among the flocks of sheep? Yet both are ascribed to the remnant of Jacob. Why? Because the Apostles of Christ are both tender and severe, tender in teaching and exhorting, severe in rebuking and avenging. How does Paul teach, <sup>2</sup>God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation; now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God! What sweeter than the dew of love, the shower of true affection? And so, on to that, "our heart is enlarged." They are such drops of dew as no one could doubt came from <sup>3</sup>the Lord, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies and the God of all comfort. Yet the same Apostle after a little writes, <sup>4</sup>This is the third time I am coming to you. I told you before and foretold you, and being absent now I write to them which heretofore have sinned and to all others, that if I come again, I will not spare, since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me. See the severity of a master, like the roaring of a lion among the beasts of the forest. For such surely are they whom he rebukes for the "uncleanness and fornication and lasciviousness which they had committed." Was he not to such as a lion? Was not Peter such, when he rebuked Ananias first and then Sapphira his wife, and they fell down and gave up the ghost? They tread down or "cast down imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God; as Christ Himself, Who spake in them, is both a lamb and the Lion of the tribe of Judah, and nothing is so terrible as the wrath of the Lamb."

And none can deliver. <sup>10</sup>For as the Apostles past from nation to nation, and trod down Heathenism, subduing it to Christ, and taking within their net the many converted nations, none could withdraw from the Apostles' doctrine those whom they had converted. The Heathen world <sup>11</sup>cried out that the state is beset, that the Christians are in their fields, their forts, their islands. <sup>12</sup>"We are a people of yesterday, and yet we have filled every place belonging to you, cities, islands, castles, towns, assemblies, your very camp, your tribes, companies, palace, senate, forum! We leave you your temples only. We can count your armies, our numbers in a single province will be greater."

Whom it returns. It is all one, whether this be said to Christ or to the remnant of Jacob, i. e. His Church. Her enemies are His, and her's only because they are His, and hate her as belonging to Him. They shall be cut off, either ceasing to be His enemies, or ceasing to be, as Julian or Arius or Anti-Christ, <sup>13</sup>whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His Mouth and shall destroy with the brightness of His Coming. And in the end, Satan also, over whom Christ gave the Apostles <sup>14</sup>power to tread on all the power of the Enemy, shall be bruised under our feet<sup>15</sup>.

10. And it shall come to pass in that day, of grace in the kingdom of Christ and of His Presence in the Apostles and with the Church, I will cut off thy horses out of the midst of thee. The greater the glory and purity of the Church, the less it needs or hangs upon human aid. The more it is reft of human aid, the more it hangs upon God. So God promises, as a blessing, that He will remove from her all mere human resources, both what was in itself evil, and what, although good, had been abused. Most of these things, whose removal is here promised, are spoken of at the same time by Isaiah, as sin, or the occasion of sin, and of God's judgments to Judah. <sup>16</sup>Soothsayers, (the same word) horses, chariots, idols the work of their hands; high towers, fenced walls. <sup>17</sup>I will take, from thee all arms wherewith, while unconverted, thou opposedst the faith," all which thou settest up as idols in place of God. (Such are witchcrafts, soothsayers, graven images, images of Ashtaroth.) "I will take from thee all outward means and instruments of defence which aforetime were turned into pride and sin;" as horses and chariots. Not such shall be the arms of the Church, not such her strongholds. A horse is a vain thing to save a man. Her arms shall be the despised Cross of shame; her warriors, they who bear it; their courage, to endure in holy patience and meekness; their might, the Holy Spirit within them; their victories, through death, not of others, but their Master's and, in His, their own. They shall overcome the world, as He overcame it, and through Him Alone and His Merits Who overcame it by suffering.

11-15. I will cut off the cities of thy land. So God promised by Zechariah <sup>18</sup>Jerusalem shall be inhabited as towns without walls; for I will be unto her a wall of fire round about. The Church shall not need the temptation of human defence; for God shall fence her in on every side. Great cities too, as the abode of luxury and sin, of power and pride, and, mostly, of cruelty, are chiefly denounced as the objects of God's anger. Babylon stands as the emblem of the whole city of the world or of the devil, as opposed to God. <sup>19</sup>The first city was built by Cain; Abel and the other saints had no continu- ing city<sup>1</sup> here. Cities then will include “<sup>2</sup>all the tumults and evil passions and ambition and strife and bloodshed, which Cain brought in among men. Cities are collectively called and are Babylon, with whom, (as in the Revelations we hear a voice from heaven saying), <sup>3</sup>the kings of the earth committed fornication and the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies; and of which it is written, <sup>4</sup>And a mighty Angel took up a stone like a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, Thus with violence shall that great city, Babylon, be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all. “Great rest then is promised to holy Zion i. e. the Church, when the cities or strongholds of the land [strongholds, as they are, of earthliness] shall be destroyed. For together with them are included all objects of desire in them, with the sight whereof the citizens of the kingdom of God, while pilgrims here, are tempted; whereof the wise man saith, Futility of vanities, all is vanity.” The fulfilment reaches on to the Day of Judgment, when the Church shall finally receive glory from the Lord, and be <sup>5</sup>without spot and wrinkle. All looks on to that Day. The very largeness of the promise, which speaks, in its fullest sense, of the destruction of things, without which we can hardly do in this life, (as cities<sup>6</sup>), or things very useful to the needs of man, (as horses,) carries us on yet more to that Day when there will be no more need of any outward things; “<sup>2</sup>when the heavy body shall be changed, and shall have the swiftness of angels, and shall be transported whither it willeth, without chariots and horses; and all things which tempt the eye shall cease; and no evil shall enter; and there shall be no need of divining, amid the presence and full knowledge of God, and where the ever-present Face of God, Who is Truth, shall shine on all, and nothing be uncertain or unknown; nor shall they need to form in their souls images of Him Whom His own shall see as He Is; nor shall they esteem any thing of self, or the work of their own hands; but God shall be All in all.” In like way, the woe on those who obey not the truth, also looks on to the end. It too is final. There is nothing to soften it. Punishments in the course of life are medicinal. Here no mention is made of Mercy, but only of executing vengeance; and that, with wrath and fury; and that, such as they have not heard. For as eye hath not seen, nor heart conceived the good things laid up in store for those who love God, so neither the evil things prepared for those who, in act, shew that they hate Him.

Ch. vi. The foregoing prophecy closed with the final cleansing of the Church and the wrath of God resting on the wicked, when, as St. Paul saith, <sup>7</sup>The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking ven- gence on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of His power; when He shall come to be glorified in His Saints, and to be admired in all them that believe. The Prophet here begins his third and last summons to judgment, in the Name, as it were, of the All-Holy Trinity, against Whom they had sinned.

1. Hear ye now what the Lord saith: If ye will not hear the rebuke of man, hear now at last the word of God. “Arise thou, Micah.” The prophet was not willing to be the herald of woe to his people; but had to arise at the bidding of God, that he might not <sup>8</sup>be rebellious like that rebellious horse. Stand up; as one having all authority to rebuke, and daunted by none. He rouses the hearer, as shewing it to be a very grave urgent matter, to be done promptly, urgently, without delay. Contend thou before [better, as in E. M. with<sup>9</sup>] the mountains. Since man, who had reason, would not use his reason, God calls the mountains and hills, who <sup>10</sup>unwillingly, as it were, had been the scenes of their idolatry, as if He would say, “<sup>11</sup>Insensate though ye be, ye are more sensible than Israel, whom I endowed with sense; for ye feel the voice and command of God your Creator and obey Him; they do not. I cite you, to represent your guilty inhabitants, that, through you, they may hear My complaint to be just, and own themselves guilty, repent, and ask forgiveness.” “The altars and idols, the blood of the sacrifices, the bones and ashes upon them, with unuttered yet clear voice, spoke of the idolatry and guilt of the Jews, and so pronounced God's charge and expostulation to be just. Ezekiel is bidden, in like way, to prophesy against the mountains of Israel<sup>12</sup>, I will bring a sword upon you, and I will destroy your high places, and your altars shall be desolate.” “<sup>13</sup>Lifeless nature without voice tells the glory of God; without ears it hears what the Lord speaks<sup>14</sup>.”

2. Hear, ye strong [or, it may be, ye enduring<sup>15</sup>], foundations of the earth. Mountains and rocks carry the soul to times far away, before and after. They change not, like the habitable, cultivated, surface of the earth. There they were, before the existence of our short-lived generations; there they will be, until time shall cease to be. They have witnessed so many vicissitudes of human things, themselves unchanging. The prophet is directed to seize this feeling of simple nature. ‘They have seen so much before me,’ Yes! ‘then they have seen all which befel my forefathers; all God's benefits, all along, to them and to us, all their and our unthankfulness.’ He will plead with Israel. God hath a strict severe judgment<sup>1</sup> with His people, and yet vouchsafes to clear Himself before His creatures, to come down from His throne of glory and place Himself on equal terms with them. He does not plead only, but mutually (such is the force of the word) im-pleads with<sup>2</sup> His people, hears if they would say aught against Himself, and then gives His own judgment<sup>3</sup>. But this willingness to hear, only makes us condemn ourselves, so that we should be without excuse before Him. We do owe ourselves wholly to Him Who made us and hath given us all things richly to enjoy. If we have withdrawn ourselves from His Service, unless He dealt hardly with us, we dealt rebelliously and ungratefully with Him. God brings all pleas into a narrow space. The fault is with Him or with us. He offers to clear Himself. He sets before us His good deeds, His Loving kindness, Providence, Grace, Long-suffering, Bounty, Truth, and contrasts with them our evil deeds, our unthankfulness, despicability, our breach of His laws, and disorderings of His creation. And then, in the face of His Goodness, He asks, 'What evil have I done, what good have I left undone?' so that our evil and negligences should be but a requital of His. For if it is evil to return evil for evil, or not to return good for good, what evil is it to return evil for His exceeding good! As He says by Isaiah, What could have been done more to My vineyard and I have not done in it? Wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes? And our Blessed Lord asks; Many good works have I shewed you from My Father. For which of those works do ye stone Me? Which of you convinceth Me of sin? And if I say the truth, why do ye not believe Me? Away from the light of God, we may plead excuses, and cast the blame of our sins upon our temptations, or passions, or nature, i. e. on Almighty God Himself, Who made us. When His light streams in upon our conscience, we are silent. Blessed if we be silenced and confess to Him then, that we be not first silenced in the Day of Judgment. Righteous Job said, "I desire to reason with God; but when his eye saw Him, he said, wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes."

3. O My people. This one tender word<sup>10</sup>, twice repeated<sup>11</sup>, contains in one a whole volume of reproof. It sets before the eyes God's choice of them of His free grace, and the whole history of His loving-kindness, if so they could be ashamed of their thanklessness and turn to Him. 'Mine,' He says, 'ye are by creation, by Providence, by great deliverances and by hourly love and guardianship, by gifts of nature, the world, and grace; such things have I done for thee; what against thee? what evil have I done unto thee?' <sup>12</sup>Thy foot did not swell these forty years, for He upbears in all ways where He leads. Wherein have I wearied thee? for <sup>13</sup>His commandments are not grievous. Thou hast been weary of Me, O

Israel, God says by Isaiah<sup>14</sup>, I have not wearied thee with in-cense; thou hast wearied Me with thine iniquities.

4. For I brought thee up out of the land of Egypt, and redeemed thee out of the house of servants. What wert thou? What art thou? Who made thee what thou art? God reminds them. They were slaves; they are His people in the heritage of the heathen, and that by His outstretched arm. God mentions some heads of the mercies which He had shewn them, when He had made them His people, His redemption of them from Egypt, His guidance through the wilderness, His leading them over the last difficulty to the promised land. The use of the familiar language of the Pentateuch<sup>15</sup> is like the touching of so many key-notes, recalling the whole harmony of His love. Moses, Aaron, and Miriam together, are Lawgiver, to deliver and instruct; Priest, to atone; and Prophetess<sup>16</sup> to praise God; and the name of Miriam at once recalled the mighty works at the Red Sea and how they then thanked God.

5. Remember now. The word translated now is a very tender one, like our "do now remember" or "do remember," beseeching instead of commanding. <sup>17</sup>"I might command, but I speak tenderly, that I may lead thee to own the truth." What Balak king of Moab consulted, and what Balaam the son of Beor answered him. God did not only raise up Moses, Aaron, Miriam, out of their brethren, but He turned the cures of the alien Balaam into a blessing; and that, not for their righteousness, (for even then they were rebellious,) but against their deserts, out of His own truth and righteousness. Not that the curse of Balaam could in itself have hurt them; but, in proportion to his reputation, it would have infused great energy into their enemies, and its reversal must have struck a great panic into them and into others. Human might having failed in Sihon and Og, Balak sought superhuman. God shewed them by their own diviner, that it was against them. Even after they had seduced Israel, through Balaam's devilish counsel, Midian seems to have been stricken by God with panic, and not to have struck a blow<sup>18</sup>.

From Shittim unto Gilgal. The words are separated by the Hebrew accent from what went before. It is then probably said in concise energy for, "Remember too from Shittim to Gilgal," i. e. all the great works of God from Shittim<sup>19</sup>, the last encampment of Israel out of the promised land, where they so sinned in Baal-peor, unto Gilgal, the first in the promised land, which they entered by miracle, where the Ark rested amid the victories given them, where the Covenant was renewed, and <sup>20</sup>the reproach of Egypt was rolled away. Remember all, from your own deep sin and rebellion to the deep mercy of God.

the Lord; His Faithfulness in performing His promises to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. God speaketh of His promises, not as what they were in themselves, mere mercy, but as what they became, through that gracious and free promise, righteousness, in that He had bound Himself to fulfil what He had, out of mere grace, promised. So in the New Testament He saith, <sup>1</sup> God is not unrighteous that He should forget your works and labour which proceedeth of love; and, <sup>2</sup> He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins. Micah speaks, by a rare idiom, of the righteousnesses of the Lord, each act of mercy being a separate effluence of His Righteousness. The very names of the places suggest the righteous acts of God, the unrighteous of Israel. “<sup>3</sup> But we too, who desire with unveiled face to behold the glory of the Lord, and have Abraham really for our father, let us, when we have sinned, hear God pleading against us, and reproving us for the multitude of His benefits. For we too once served Pharaoh and the people of Egypt, labouring in works of mire and clay; and He redeemed us Who gave Himself a Redemption for all; that we, the redeemed of the Lord <sup>4</sup>, whom He redeemed out of the hand of the enemy and gathered from the lands, might say, His mercy endureth for ever. He sent also before our face Moses, the spiritual Law, and Aaron the High Priest, not bearing the typical Ephod and Urim, but having in His Forehead the seal of holiness which God the Father sealed; and Miriam, the foreshewing of prophets. Recollect we too what he thought against us who willed to devour us, the true Balak, Satan, who laid snares for us through Balaam, the destroyer of the people, fearing lest we should cover his land and occupy it, withdrawing the earthly-minded from his empire.”

6, 7. Wherewith shall I come before the Lord? The people, thus arraigned, bursts in, as men do, with professions that they would be no more ungrateful; that they will do any thing, every thing—but what they ought. With them it shall be but “Ask and have.” They wish only to know, with what they shall come? They would be beforehand <sup>5</sup> with Him, anticipating His wishes; they would, with all the submission of a creature, bow, prostrate themselves before God; they acknowledge His High Majesty, who dwelleth on high <sup>6</sup>, the most High God, and would abase themselves <sup>7</sup> before His lofty greatness, if they but knew, “how” or “wherewith.” They would give of their best; sacrifices the choicest of their kind, which should be wholly His, whole-burnt-offerings, offered exactly according to the law <sup>8</sup>, bullocks of a year old; then too, the next choice offering, the rams; and these, as they were offered for the whole people on very solemn occasions, in vast multitudes, thousands or ten thousands <sup>11</sup>; the oil which accompanied the burnt sacrifice, should flow in rivers <sup>12</sup>; nay, more still; they would not withhold their sons, their first born sons, from God, part, as they were, of themselves, or any fruit of their own body. They enhance the offering by naming the tender relation to themselves <sup>13</sup>. They would offer every thing, (even what God forbade) excepting only what alone He asked for, their heart, its love and its obedience <sup>14</sup>. The form of their offer contains this; they ask zealously, “with what shall I come.” It is an outward offering only, a thing which they would bring. Hypocritical eagerness! a sin against light. For to enquire further, when God has already revealed anything, is to deny that He has revealed it. It comes from the wish that He had not revealed what He has revealed. “<sup>15</sup> Who-so, after he hath found the truth, discusseth any thing further, seeketh a lie.” God had told them, long before, from the time that He made them His people, what he desired of them; So Micah answers,

8. He hath shewed thee. Micah does not tell them now, as for the first time; which would have excused them. He says, He hath shewed thee; He, about Whose mind and will and pleasure they were pretending to enquire, the Lord their God. He had shewn it to them. The law was full of it. He shewed it to them, when He said, <sup>16</sup> And now, Israel, what doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but to fear the Lord thy God, to walk in all His ways, and to love Him and to serve the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, to keep the commandments of the Lord and His statutes which I command thee this day for thy good. They had asked, “with what outward thing <sup>17</sup> shall I come before the Lord;” the prophet tells them, “what thing is good,” the inward man of the heart, righteousness, love, humility.

And what doth the Lord require [search, seek] of thee? The very word <sup>18</sup> implies an earnest search within. He would say, “<sup>19</sup> Trouble not thyself as to any of these things, burnt-offerings, rams, calves, without thee. For God seeketh not thine, but thee; not thy substance, but thy spirit; not ram or goat, but thy heart.” “<sup>20</sup> Thou askest, what thou shouldst offer for thee? Offer thyself. For what else doth the Lord seek of thee, but thee? Because, of all earthly creatures, He hath made nothing better than thee, He seeketh thyself from thyself, because thou hadst lost thyself.”

To do judgment, are chiefly all acts of equity; to love mercy, all deeds of love. Judgment, is what right requires; mercy, what love. Yet, secondarily, “to do judgment” is to pass righteous judgments in all cases; and so, as to others, <sup>1</sup> judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment; and as to one's self also. Judge equitably and kindly of others, humbly of thyself. <sup>2</sup> *Judge of thyself in thyself without acceptance of thine own person, so as not to spare thy sins, nor take pleasure in them, because thou hast done them. Neither praise thyself in what is good in thee, nor accuse God in what is evil in thee. For this is wrong judgment, and so, not judgment at all. This thou didst, being evil; reverse it, and it will be right. Praise God in what is good in thee; accuse thyself in what is evil. So shalt thou anticipate the judgment of God, as He saith, <sup>3</sup> If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged of the Lord." He addeth, love mercy; being merciful, out of love, <sup>4</sup> not of necessity, for God loveth a cheerful giver. These acts together contain the whole duty to man, corresponding with and formed upon the mercy and justice of God<sup>5</sup>. All which is due, any how or in any way, is of judgment; all which is free toward man, although not free toward God, is of mercy. There remains, walk humbly with thy God; not, how thyself only before Him, as they had offered<sup>6</sup>, nor again walk with Him only, as did Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Job; but walk humbly (lit. how down <sup>7</sup> the going) yet still with thy God; never lifting up thyself, never sleeping, never standing still, but ever walking on, yet ever casting thyself down; and the more thou goest on in grace, the more cast thyself down; as our Lord saith, <sup>8</sup> *When ye have done all these things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants; we have done that which was our duty to do.

It is not a "crouching before God" displeased, (such as they had thought of,) but the humble love of the forgiven; walk humbly, as the creature with the Creator, but in love, with thine own God. Humble thyself with God, Who humbled Himself in the flesh; walk on with Him, Who is thy Way. Neither humility nor obedience alone would be true graces; but to cleave fast to God, because He is thine All, and to bow thyself down, because thou art nothing, and thine All is He and of Him. It is altogether a Gospel-precept; bidding us, <sup>9</sup> Be ye perfect, as your Father which is in Heaven is perfect; <sup>10</sup> Be merciful, as your Father also is merciful; and yet, in the end, have <sup>11</sup> that same mind which was also in Christ Jesus, Who made Himself of no reputation.

The offers of the people, stated in the bare nakedness in which Micah exhibits them, have a character of irony. But it is the irony of the truth and of the fact itself. The creature has nothing of its own to offer; <sup>12</sup> the blood of bulls and goats cannot take away sin; and the offerings, as they rise in value, become, not useless only but, sinful. Such offerings would bring down anger, not mercy. Micah's words then are, for their vividness, an almost proverbial expression of the nothingness of all which we sinners could offer to God. <sup>13</sup> We, who are of the people of God, knowing that <sup>14</sup> in His sight shall no man living be justified, and saying, <sup>15</sup> I am a beast with Thee, trust in no pleas before His judgment-seat, but pray; yet we put no trust in our very prayers. For there is nothing worthy to be offered to God for sin, and no humility can wash away the stains of offences. In penitence for our sins, we hesitate and say, Wherewith shall I come before the Lord? how shall I come, so as to be admitted into familiar intercourse with my God? One and the same spirit revolveth these things in each of us or of those before us, who have been pricked to repentance, 'what worthy offering can I make to the Lord?' This and the like we revolve, as the Apostle saith; <sup>16</sup> We know not what to pray for as we ought; but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. 'Should I offer myself wholly as a burnt-offering to Him? If, understanding spiritually all the Levitical sacrifices, I should present them in myself, and offer my first-born, i. e. what is chief in me, my soul, I should find nothing worthy of His greatness. Neither in ourselves, nor in ought earthly, can we find any thing worthy to be offered to reconcile us with God. For the sin of the soul, blood alone is worthy to be offered; not the blood of calves, or rams, or goats, but our own; yet our own too is not offered, but given back, being due already<sup>17</sup>. The Blood of Christ Alone sufficeth to do away all sin.' <sup>18</sup> The whole is said, in order to instruct us, that, without the shedding of the Blood of Christ and its Virtue and Merits, we cannot please God, though we offered ourselves and all that we have, within and without; and also, that so great are the benefits bestowed upon us by the love of Christ, that we can repay nothing of them."

But then it is clear that there is no teaching in this passage in Micah, which there is not in the law<sup>19</sup>. The developments in the Prophets relate to the Person and character of the Redeemer. The law too contained both elements; 1) the ritual of sacrifice, impressing on the Jew the need of an Atoner; 2) the moral law, and the graces inculcated in it, obedience, love of God and man, justice, mercy, humility, and the rest. There was no hint in the law, that half was acceptable to God instead of the whole; that sacrifice of animals would supersede self-sacrifice or obedience. There was nothing, on which the Pharisee could base his heresy. What Micah said, Moses had said. The corrupt of the people offered a half-service, what cost them least, as faith without love always does. Micah, in this, reveals to them nothing new; but tells them that this half-service is contrary to the first principles of their law. He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good. Sacrifice, without love of God and man, was not even so much as the body without the soul. It was an abortion, a monster. For one end of sacrifice was to inculcate the insufficiency of all our good, apart from the Blood of Christ; that, do what we would, <sup>20</sup> all came short of the glory of God. But to substitute sacrifice, which was a confession that at best we were miserable sinners, unable, of ourselves, to please God, for any efforts to please Him or to avoid displeasing Him, would be a direct contradiction of the law, antinomianism under the dispensation of the law itself.

Micah changes the words of Moses, in order to adapt them to the crying sins of Israel at that time. He then upbraids them in detail, and that, with those sins which were patent, which, when brought home to them, they could not deny, the sins against their neighbour.

ceeding covetousness and love of luxury, not only did wrong but were filled, not so much with riches, as with violence. Violence is the very meat and drink wherewith they are filled, yea, and wherewith they shall be filled, when it is returned upon their heads.

And the inhabitants thereof have spoken lies. Fraud is itself lying, and lying is its inseparable companion. <sup>1</sup> Lying followeth the gathering together of riches, and the hard wont to lay up riches hath a deceitful tongue." The sin, he saith, is spread throughout all her inhabitants; i. e. all of them, as their wont, have spoken lies, and, even when they speak not, the lie is ready; their tongue is deceitful (lit. deceit) in their mouth. It is deceit, nothing but deceit, and that, deceit which should <sup>2</sup> "overthrow" and ruin others. One intent on gain has the lie ever ready to be uttered, even when he speaks not. It lurks concealed, until it is needed.

13. Therefore also will I, [lit. And I too,] i. e. this dost thou, and thus will I too do. <sup>3</sup> As thou madest sick the heart of the poor oppressed, so will I, by My grievous and severe punishments, make thee sick; <sup>4</sup> or make thy wound incurable, as in Nahum <sup>4</sup>, thy wound is grievous, lit. made sick. In making thee desolate because of thy sins. The heaping up riches shall itself be the cause of thy being waste, deserted, desolate.

14. Thou shalt eat, but not be satisfied. The correspondence of the punishment with the sin shall shew that it is not by chance, but from the just judgment of God. The curse of God shall go with what they eat, and it shall not nourish them. The word, thou, is thrice repeated<sup>5</sup>. As God had just said, I too, so here, Thou. Thou, the same who hast plundered others, shalt thyself eat, and not be satisfied; "thou shalt sow, and not reap; thou shalt tread the olive, and thou shalt not anoint thee with oil." Upon extreme but ill-gotten abundance, there followeth extreme want. And whoso, adds one<sup>6</sup>, "seeth not this in our ways and our times is absolutely blind. For in no period have we ever read that there was so much gold and silver, or so much discomfort and indigence, so that those most true words of Christ Jesus seem to have been especially spoken of us," <sup>7</sup> Take heed, for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." And is not this true of us now?

Thy casting down shall be in the midst of thee. Where thou hast laid up thy treasures, or rather thy wickedness, there thou shalt sink down, or give way, from inward decay, in the very centre of thy wealth and thy sin. They had said, <sup>8</sup> Is not the Lord in the midst of us? None evil can come upon us. Micah tells them of a different indweller. God had departed from them, and left them to their inherent nothingness. God had been their stay; without God, human strength collapses. Scarcely any destruction is altogether hopeless, save that which cometh from within. Most storms pass over, tear off boughs and leaves, but the stem remains. Inward decay or excision alone are humanly irrecoverable. The political death of the people was, in God's hands, to be the instrument of their regeneration.

Morally too, and at all times, inward emptiness is the fruit of unrighteous fulness. It is disease, not strength; as even Heathen proverbs said; "the love of money is a dropsy; to drink increaseth the thirst," and "amid mighty wealth, poor;" and Holy Scripture, <sup>9</sup> The rich He sendeth empty away. And truly they must be empty. For what can fill the soul, save God? <sup>10</sup> This is true too of such as, like the Bishop of Sardis, <sup>11</sup> have a name that they live and are dead," <sup>12</sup> such as do some things good, feed on the word of God, but attain to no fruit of righteousness; "who corrupt natural and seeming good by inward decay; who appear righteous before men, are active and zealous for good ends, but spoil all by some secret sin or wrong end, as vain-glory or praise of men, whereby they lose the praise of God. Their casting down shall be in the midst of them. The meaning of the whole is the same, whether the word be rendered casting down, i. e. downfall, (lit. sinking down <sup>13</sup>), or emptiness, especially of the stomach, perhaps from the feeling of "sinking."

Thou shalt take hold to rescue or remove to a safe place from the enemy, those whom he would take from thee, but shalt not wholly deliver; and that which thou deliverest for a time, will I give up to the sword, i. e. the children for whose sake they pleaded that they got together this wealth; as, now too, the idols, for whose sake men toil wrongly all their life, are often suddenly taken away. Their goods too may be said to be given to the sword, i. e. to the enemy.

15. Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap. Micah renews the threatenings of the law <sup>14</sup>, which they had been habitually breaking. Those prophecies had been fulfilled before, throughout their history; they had been fulfilled lately in Israel for the like oppression of the poor <sup>15</sup>. Their frequent fulfilment spoke as much of a law of God's righteousness, punishing sin, as the yearly supply in the ordinary course of nature spoke of His loving Providence. It is the bitterest punishment to the covetous to have the things which they coveted, taken away before their eyes; it was a token of God's Hand, that He took them away, when just within their grasp. The prophet brings it before their eyes, that they might feel beforehand the bitterness of forgetting them. <sup>16</sup> They should lose, not only what they gained unjustly, but the produce of their labour, care, industry, as, in agriculture, it is said that there is mostly much labor, little fraud, much benefit." Harvest is a proverb for joy; <sup>17</sup> they joy before Thee according to the joy in harvest; <sup>1</sup>wine maketh glad the heart of man, and oil is to make him a cheerful countenance. But the harvest shall be turned into sorrow, <sup>2</sup>the oil and wine shall be taken away, when all the labour had been employed. Yet, since all these operations in nature are adapted to be, and are used as, symbols of things spiritual, then the words which describe them are adapted to be spiritual proverbs. Spiritually, <sup>3</sup>he soweth and reapeth not, who <sup>4</sup>soweth to the flesh, and of the flesh reapeth corruption, things corruptible, and inward decay and condemnation. He treadeth the olive, who, by shameful deeds contrary to the law, <sup>5</sup>grieveth the Holy Spirit of God, and therefore obtaineth not gladness of spirit; he maketh wine, yet drinketh not wine, who teacheth others, not himself." They too take hold but do not deliver, who for a while believe and in time of temptation fall away, who repent for a while and then fall back into old sins, or in other ways bring no fruit to perfection; taking up the Cross for a while and then wearying; using religious practices, as, more frequent prayer or fasting, and then tiring; cultivating some graces and then despairing because they see not the fruits. These tread the olive, but are not anointed with the oil of the Holy Spirit of grace, who <sup>6</sup>end by doing for the sake of man, what they had thought to do out of the love for God, and abandon, for some fear of man, the good which they had begun."

16. For the statutes of Omri are kept, rather, (like E. M. he doth much keep,) And he doth keep diligently for himself. Both ways express much diligence in evil<sup>7</sup>. To "keep God's commandments" was the familiar phrase, in which Israel was exhorted, by every motive of hope and fear, to obedience to God. <sup>8</sup>I know him, God says of Abraham, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do judgment and justice. This was the fundamental commandment immediately after the deliverance from Egypt upon their first murmuring. <sup>9</sup>The Lord made there (at Marah) for them a statute and ordinance, and said, If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt do that which is right in His sight, and wilt give ear to His commandments and keep all His statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee which I have brought upon the Egyptians. In this character He revealed Himself on Mount Sinai, as <sup>10</sup>showing mercy unto thousands of them that love Me and keep My commandments. This was their covenant, <sup>11</sup>Thou hast avouched the Lord this day to be thy God and to walk in His ways, and to keep His statutes and His commandments and His judgments and to hearken unto His voice. This was so often enforced upon them in the law, as the condition upon which they should hold their land, if they kept the covenant<sup>12</sup>, the commandments<sup>13</sup>, the judgments<sup>14</sup>, the statutes<sup>15</sup>, the testimonies<sup>16</sup>, the charge<sup>17</sup> of the Lord. Under this term all the curses of the law were threatened, if they <sup>18</sup>hearkened not unto the voice of the Lord their God, to keep His commandments and His statutes which He commanded them.

Under this again the future of good and evil was, in Solomon, set before the house of David; of unbroken succession on his throne, if <sup>19</sup>thou wilt keep My commandments; but contrariwise, if ye or your children will not keep My commandments and My statutes, banishment, destruction of the temple, and themselves to be <sup>20</sup>a proverb and a byword among all people. This was the object of their existence, <sup>21</sup>that they might keep His statutes and observe His laws. This was the summary of their disobedience, <sup>22</sup>they kept not the covenant of God. And now was come the contrary to all this. They had not kept the commandments of God; and those commandments of man which were the most contrary to the commandments of God, they had kept and did keep diligently. Alas! that the Christian world should be so like them! What iron habit or custom of man, what fashion, is not kept, if it is against the law of God? How few are not more afraid of man than God! Had God's command run, Speak evil one of another, brethren, would it not have been the best kept of all His commandments? God says, Speak not evil; custom, the conversation around, fear of man, say, Speak evil; man's commandment is kept; God's is not kept. And no one repents or makes restitution; few even cease from the sin.

Scripture does not record, what was the special aggravation of the sin of Omri, since the accursed worship of Baal was brought in by Ahab<sup>23</sup>, his son. But, as usual, "like father, like son." The son developed the sins of the father. Some special sinfulness of Omri is implied, in that Athaliah, the murderess of her children, is called after her grandfather, Omri, not after her father, Ahab<sup>24</sup>. Heresiarchs have a deeper guilt than their followers, although the heresy itself is commonly developed later. Omri settled for a while the kingdom of Israel, after the anarchy which followed on the murder of Elah, and slew Zimri, his murderer. Yet before God, he did worse than all before him, and he walked in all the way of Jeroboam<sup>25</sup>. Yet this too did not suffice Judah; for it follows, And all the doings of the house of Ahab, who again <sup>26</sup>did evil in the sight of the Lord above all that were before him and served Baal; Ahab, to whom none <sup>27</sup>was like in sin, who did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord. These were they, whose statutes Judah now kept, as diligently and accurately as if it had been a religious act. They kept, not the statutes of the Lord, but the statutes of Omri; they kept, as their pattern before their eyes, all the doings of the house of Ahab, his luxury, oppression, the bloodshedding of Naboth; and they walked onward, not, as God bade them, humbly with Him, but in their counsels. And what must be the end of all this? that I should make thee a desolation. They acted, as though the very end and object of all their acts were that, wherein they ended, their own destruction and reproach<sup>28</sup>.

Therefore ye shall bear the reproach of My people. The title of the people of God must be a glory or a reproach. Judah had gloried in being God's people, outwardly, by His covenant and protection; they were envied for the outward distinction. They refused to be so inwardly, and gave themselves to the hideous, desecrating, worship of Baal. Now then what had been their pride, should be the aggravation of their punishment. Now too we hear of people every where zealous for a system, which their deeds belie. Faith, without love, (such as their character had been,) feels any insult to the relation to God, which by its deeds it disgraces. Though they had themselves neglected God, yet it was a heavy burden to them to bear the triumph of the heathen over them, that God was unable to help them, or had cast them off. <sup>1</sup> These are the people of the Lord and are gone forth, out of His land. <sup>2</sup> Wherefore should they say among the heathen, where is their God? <sup>3</sup> We are confounded, because we have heard reproach, shame hath covered our faces, for strangers are come into the sanctuaries of the Lord's house. <sup>4</sup> We are become a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and derision to them that are round about us. <sup>5</sup> Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and derision to them that are round about us. Thou makest us a byword among the heathen, a shaking of the head among the people. My confusion is daily before me, and the shame of my face hath covered me, for the voice of him that slandereth and blasphemeth, by reason of the enemy and the avenger.

The words, the reproach of My people, may also include “the reproach wherewith God in the law <sup>7</sup> threatened His people if they should forsake Him”, which indeed comes to the same thing, the one being the prophecy, the other the fulfilment. The word hissing in itself recalled the threat to David's house in Solomon; <sup>8</sup> At this house, which is high, every one that passeth by it shall be astonished and hiss. Micah's phrase became a favourite expression of Jeremiah<sup>9</sup>. So only do God's prophets denounce. It is a marvellous glimpse into man's religious history, that faith, although it had been inoperative and was trampled upon without, should still survive; nay, that God, Whom in prosperity they had forsaken and forgotten, should be remembered, when He seemed to forget and to forsake them. Had the captive Jews abandoned their faith, the reproach would have ceased. The words, ye shall hear the reproach of My people are, at once, a prediction of their deserved suffering for the profanation of God's Name by their misdeeds, and of their perseverance in that faith which, up to that time, they had mostly neglected.

CHAP. VII. The Prophet's office of threatening woe is now over. Here, out of love, he himself cryeth woe unto himself. He hath <sup>10</sup> continual sorrow in heart for his people. He bewails what he cannot amend, and, by bewailing, shews them how much more they should bewail it, over whose sins he sorrows; how certain the destruction is, since there is none to stand in the gap and turn away the wrath of God, no “ten righteous,” for whose sake the city may be spared. “<sup>11</sup> These words flow out of the fount of pity, because the good zeal, wherewith the holy seem to speak severely, is never without pity. They are wroth with the sins, they sympathise with the sinner.” So Isaiah mourned for the judgment, which he prophesied against the world, <sup>12</sup> Woe is me! he sorrowed even for Moab<sup>13</sup>; and Joel, <sup>14</sup> Alas for the day! and Jeremiah, in that exclamation of impassioned sorrow; <sup>15</sup> Woe is me, my mother, that thou hast borne me a man of strife and a man of contention to the whole world!

1. Woe<sup>16</sup> is me! for I am, as when they have gathered the summer fruits<sup>17</sup>, as the grape-gleanings of the vintage. The vineyard of the Lord of hosts, Isaiah said at the same time<sup>18</sup>, is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah His pleasant plants. Isaiah said, it brought forth wild grapes; Micah, that there are but gleanings, few and poor. It is as though Satan pressed the vineyard of the Lord, and made the most his prey, and few were left to those who glean for Christ; <sup>19</sup> the foxes have eaten the grapes. Some few remain too high out of their reach, or hidden behind the leaves, or, it may be, <sup>20</sup> falling in the time of gathering, fouled, sullied, marred and stained, yet left.” So in the gleanings there may be three sorts of souls; <sup>21</sup> two or three in the top of the uppermost bough, which were not touched; or those unripe, which are but imperfect and poor; or those who had fallen, yet were not wholly carried away. These too are all sought with difficulty; they had escaped the gatherer's eye, they are few and rare; it might seem at first sight, as though there were none. There is no cluster to eat; for the vintage is past, the best is but as a sour grape which sets the teeth on edge. My soul desired the first-ripe fig<sup>22</sup>. These are they which, having survived the sharpness of winter, ripen early, about the end of June; they are the sweetest<sup>23</sup>; but he longed for them in vain. He addressed a carnal people, who could understand only carnal things, on the side which they could understand. Our longings, though we pervert them, are God's gift. As they desired those things which refresh or recruit the thirsty body, as their whole self was gathered into the craving for that which was to restore them, so was it with him. Such is the longing of God for man's conversion and salvation; such is the thirst of His ministers; such, their pains in seeking, their sorrow in not finding. “<sup>24</sup> There were none, through whose goodness the soul of the prophet might spiritually be refreshed, in joy at his growth in grace, as St. Paul saith to Philemon, <sup>25</sup> refresh my bowels in the Lord. So our Lord saith in Isaiah, <sup>26</sup> I said, I have laboured in vain, I have spent my strength for nought and in vain. <sup>27</sup> Jesus was grieved at the hardness of their hearts.

“<sup>27</sup> The first-ripe fig may be the image of the righteous of old, as the Patriarchs or the Fathers, such as in the later days we fain would see.”

2. The good [or godly, or merciful, E. M.] man. The Hebrew word contains all. It is 'he who loveth tenderly and piously' God, for His own sake, and man, for the sake of God. Mercy was probably chiefly intended, since it was to this that the prophet had exhorted<sup>1</sup>, and the sins which he proceeds to speak of, are against this. But imaginary love of God without love of man, or love of man without the love of God, is mere self-deceit. Is perished out of the earth, i. e. by an untimely death<sup>2</sup>. The good had either been withdrawn by God from the evil to come<sup>3</sup>, or had been cut off by those who laid wait for blood; in which case their death brought a double evil, through the guilt which such sin contracted, and then, through the loss of those who might be an example to others, and whose prayers God would hear. The loving and upright, all, who were men of mercy and truth, had ceased. They who were left, all lie in wait for blood, lit. bloods<sup>4</sup>, i. e. bloodshedding; all, as far as man can see; as Elijah complains that he was left alone. Amid the vast number of the wicked, the righteous were as though they were not. Isaiah, at the same time, complains of the like sins, and that it was as though there were none righteous; Your hands are defiled with blood, and your fingers with iniquity; your lips have spoken lies, your tongue hath muttered perverseness. None calleth for justice, nor any pleadeth for truth. Indirectly, or directly, they destroyed life<sup>5</sup>. To violence they add treachery. The good and loving had perished, and all is now violence; the upright had ceased, and all now is deceit. They hunt every man his brother with a net. Every man is the brother of every man, because he is man, born of the same first parent, children of the same Father: yet they lay wait for one another, as hunters for wild beasts<sup>7</sup>.

3. That they may do evil with both hands earnestly, [lit. upon evil both hands to do well,] i. e. "both their hands are upon evil to do it well," or "earnestly<sup>8</sup>," as our translation gives the meaning; only the Hebrew expresses more, that evil is their good, and their good or excellence is in evil. Bad men gain a dreadful skill and wisdom in evil, as Satan has; and cleverness in evil is their delight. <sup>9</sup> They call the evil of their hands good. The prince asketh, and the judge asketh (or, it may more readily be supplied, judgeth, doth that which is his office,) against right for a reward, (which was strictly forbidden<sup>10</sup>), and the great man he uttereth his mischievous desire, (or the desire of his soul.) Even the shew of good is laid aside; whatever the heart conceives and covets, it utters;—mischief to others and in the end to itself. The mischief comes forth from the soul, and returns upon it. The elders and nobles in the city<sup>11</sup>, as well as Ahab, took part, (as one instance,) in the murder of Naboth. The great man, however, here, is rather the source of the evil, which he induces others to effect; so that as many as there were great, so many sources were there of oppression. All, prince, judges, the great, unite in the ill, and this not once only, but they are ever doing it<sup>12</sup>, and so they wrap it up, (lit. twist<sup>13</sup>, intertwine it.) Things are twisted, either to strengthen, or to pervert or intricate them. It might mean, they strengthen it, that which their soul covets against the poor, or they pervert it, the cause of the poor.

4. The best of them is as a brier; the gentlest of them is a thorn, <sup>14</sup> strong, hard, piercing, which letteth nothing unresisting pass by but it taketh from it, "robbing the fleece, and wounding the sheep." The most upright, those who, in comparison of others still worse, seem so, is sharper than a thorn hedge. (lit. the upright, than a thorn hedge.) They are not like it only, but worse, and that in all ways; none is specified, and so none excepted; they were more crooked, more tangled, sharper. Both, as hedges, were set for protection; both, turned to injury. <sup>15</sup> So that, where you would look for help, thence comes suffering. And if such be the best, what the rest?

The day of thy watchmen and thy visitation cometh. When all, even the good, are thus corrupted, the iniquity is full. Nothing now hinders the visitation, which the watchmen, or prophets, had so long foreseen and forewarned of. Now shall be their perplexity<sup>16</sup>; now, without delay; for the day of destruction ever breaketh suddenly upon the sinner. <sup>17</sup> When they say, peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them. <sup>18</sup> Whose destruction cometh suddenly at an instant. They had perplexed the cause of the oppressed; they themselves were tangled together, intertwined in mischief, as a thorn-hedge. They should be caught in their own snare; they had perplexed their paths and should find no outlet.

5. 6. Trust ye not in a friend. It is part of the perplexity of crooked ways, that all relationships are put out of joint.

The two cases cited to the contrary, the thorough destruction of the calf, (Deut. ix. 21,) and of the house of Baal, (2 Kings xi. 18,) were, of course, good acts. So to "search well," Deut. xvii. 4, xix. 18. <sup>9</sup> S. Jer. <sup>10</sup> Deut. xvi. 19. What remains of the root has the meaning of "twisted," (in מְשַׁחֵם, "a rope") or "entangled," (in מְשַׁחֵם, "thick boughs.") <sup>13</sup> The Heb. מְשַׁחֵם seems to have been different from the Arab. which is a "solanum," (Cels. Hierob. ii. 85.) but Prov. xv. 19, (where it occurs besides,) shews that it served as a hedge. <sup>14</sup> In the Hebrew the two words "mesucah," "thorn hedge," and "mebucah," "perplexity," are alike in sound. <sup>15</sup> 1 Thess. v. 8. <sup>16</sup> See Is. xxx. 13. comp. 2 Pet. ii. 1, "swift destruction;"

Selfishness rends each from the other; and disjoins the whole frame of society. Passions and sin break every band of friendship, kindred, gratitude, nature. "Every one seeketh his own." Times of trial and of outward harass increase this; so that God's visitations are seasons of the most frightful recklessness as to every thing but self. So had God foretold<sup>1</sup>; so it was in the siege of Samaria<sup>2</sup>, and in that of Jerusalem both by the Chaldeans<sup>3</sup> and by the Romans<sup>4</sup>. When the soul has lost the love of God, all other is but seeming love, since natural affection is from Him, and it too dies out, as God gives the soul over to itself<sup>5</sup>. The words describe partly the inward corruption, partly the outward causes which shall call it forth. There is no real trust in any, where all are corrupt. The outward straitness and perplexity, in which they shall be, makes that to crumble and fall to pieces, which was inwardly decayed and severed before. The words deepen, as they go on. First, the friend, or neighbour, the common band of man and man; then the guide, (or, as the word also means, one familiar, united by intimacy, to whom, by continual intercourse, the soul was used;) then the wife who lay in the bosom, nearest to the secrets of the heart; then those to whom all reverence is due, father and mother. Our Lord said that this should be fulfilled in the hatred of His Gospel. He begins His warning as to it, with a caution like that of the prophet; <sup>6</sup>Be ye wise as serpents, and beware of men. Then He says, how these words should still be true<sup>7</sup>. There never were wanting pleas of earthly interest against the truth. He Himself was cut off, lest <sup>8</sup>the Romans should take away their place and nation. The Apostles were accused, that they meant to bring this Man's Blood upon the chief priests<sup>9</sup>; or as <sup>10</sup>ring-leaders of the sect of the Nazarenes, pestilent fellows and movers of sedition, turning the world upside down, setters up of another king; troublers of the city; commanding things unlawful for Romans to practise; setters forth of strange gods; turning away much people; endangering not men's craft only, but the honor of their gods; evil doers. Truth is against the world's ways, so the world is against it. Holy zeal hates sin, so sinners hate it. It troubles them, so they count it, one which troubleth Israel<sup>11</sup>. Tertullian, in a public defence of Christians in the second century, writes, "<sup>12</sup>Truth set out with being herself hated; as soon as she appeared, she is an enemy. As many as are strangers to it, so many are its foes; and the Jews indeed appropriately from their rivalry, the soldiers from their violence, even they of our own household from nature. Each day are we beset, each day betrayed; in our very meetings and assemblies are we mostly surprised." There was no lack of pleas. "<sup>13</sup>A Christian thou deemest a man guilty of every crime, an enemy of the gods, of the Emperors, of law, of morals, of all nature;" "factious," "authors of all public calamities through the anger of the heathen gods," "impious," "atheists," "disloyal," "public enemies." Jews, in the largest sense of the word they of their own household, were ever the deadliest enemies of Christians, the inventors of calumnies, the authors of persecutions. "What other race," says<sup>14</sup> Tertullian, "is the seed-plot of our calumnies?" Then the Acts of the Martyrs tell, how Christians were betrayed by near kinsfolk for private interest, or for revenge, because they would not join in things unlawful. "<sup>15</sup>So many are the instances in daily life, [of the daughter rising against the mother] that we should rather mourn that they are so many, than seek them out."—"I seek no examples, [of those of a man's own household being his foes] they are too many, that we should have any need of witness." "<sup>16</sup>Yet ought we not, on account of these and like words of Holy Scripture, to be mistrustful or suspicious, or alway to presume the worst, but to be cautious and prudent. For Holy Scripture speaketh with reference to times, causes, persons, places." So St. John saith, "<sup>17</sup>Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits, whether they are of God.

7. Therefore, (And,) when all these things come to pass and all human help fails, I, for my part, will look unto, (lit. on) the Lord God, the Unchangeable. The prophet sets himself, I, with emphasis, against the multitude of the ungodly. When all forsake, betray, fail, when <sup>18</sup>love is waxed cold, and men, in the last days, shall be <sup>19</sup>lovers of their own selves, not lovers of God, I,—he does not say, "will trust," but—will, "<sup>20</sup>with the eye of the heart contemplating, loving, venerating God most High, and weighing His mercy and justice," gaze intently<sup>20</sup> with the devotion of faith toward Him, though I see Him not: yet so too I will rest in Him<sup>21</sup> and on Him, as the eyes are wont to rest in trust and love and dependence, and as, on the other hand, the Eyes of God <sup>22</sup>espy into man and dwell on him, never leaving him unbeheld. I will espy Him, although from afar, with the eyes of the soul, as a watchman, (the word is the same,) looking for His Coming and announcing it to others; and until He comes, I will wait [I would wait] with trust unbroken by any troubles or delay, as Job saith, "<sup>23</sup>Though He slay me, yet will I put my trust in Him." The word is almost appropriated to a longing waiting for God<sup>24</sup>. For the God of my salvation. This too became a wonted title of God<sup>25</sup>, a title, speaking of past deliverances, as well as of confidence and of hope. Deliverance and salvation are bound up with God, and that, in man's personal experience. It is not only, "Saviour God," but "God, my Saviour." Thou who hast been, art, and wilt be, my God, my saving God. It is a prelude to the name of Jesus, our Redeeming God. The Lord will hear me. His purpose of waiting on God he had expressed wistfully. I would wait<sup>26</sup>; for man's longing trust must be upheld by God. Of God's mercy he speaks confidently, the Lord will hear me, He, Who is ever "more ready to hear than we to pray." He has no doubts, but, as Abraham said, "<sup>27</sup>the Lord will provide, so he, The Lord will hear me."

LORD, because I have sinned against him, until he plead my cause, and execute judgment for me : <sup>p</sup> he will bring me forth to the light, and I shall behold his righteousness.

So, when Jehoshaphat prayed, <sup>1</sup> We have no might against this great company that cometh against us, neither know we what to do, but our eyes are upon Thee ; God answered by the prophet, Be not afraid nor dismayed by reason of this great multitude ; for the battle is not yours, but God's. Micah unites with himself all the faithful as one, "in the unity of the spirit," wherein all are one band, looking, waiting, praying for His Coming in His kingdom. <sup>2</sup> "God is our only refuge and asylum in things desperate, and rejoices to help in them, in order to shew His supreme Power and Goodness especially to those who believe, hope, and ask it. Therefore all mistrust and despondency is then to be supremely avoided, and a certain hope and confidence in God is to be elicited. This will call forth the help of God assuredly, yea though it were by miracle, as to Lot in Sodom, to Moses and the people from Pharaoh, to David from Saul, to Hezekiah from Sennacherib, to the Maccabees from Antiochus. This our proverbs express<sup>3</sup>, how God aids, when there is least sign of it."

8. Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy. The Prophet still more makes himself one with the people, not only as looking for God, but in penitence, as Daniel bewails <sup>4</sup> his own sins and the sins of his people. The enemy is Babylon and Edom<sup>5</sup> ; and then, in all times, (since this was written for all times, and the relations of the people of God and of its enemies are the same,) whosoever, whether devils or evil men, rejoice over the falls of God's people. Rejoice not ; for thou hast no real cause ; the triumphing of the ungodly, and the fall of the godly, is but for a moment. When I fall, I shall arise ; (lit. when I have fallen, I have arisen ;) expressing both the certainty and speed of the recovery. To fall<sup>7</sup> and to arise is one. <sup>8</sup> "The fall of infirmity is not grave, if free from the desire of the will. Have the will to rise, He is at hand Who will cause thee to rise." <sup>9</sup> "Though I have sinned, Thou forgivest the sin ; though I have fallen, thou raisest up ; lest they, who rejoice in the sins of others, should have occasion to exult. For we who have sinned more, have gained more ; for Thy grace maketh more blessed than our own innocence."

When I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light unto me. <sup>10</sup> "He does not say 'lie,' but sit ; she was not as one dead, without hope of life, but she sat solitary as a widow, helpless, unable to restore herself, yet waiting for God's time. The darkness of the captivity was lightened by the light of the prophetic grace which shone through Daniel and Ezekiel, and by the faithfulness of the three children, and the brightness of Divine glory shed abroad through them, when Nebuchadnezzar proclaimed to all people that their God was <sup>11</sup> God of gods and Lord of kings, and that none should <sup>12</sup> speak any thing amiss against Him. Still more when, at the close of the captivity, they were delivered from sorrow, trouble, bondage, death, to joy, rest, freedom, life. Yet how much more in Christ, (for Whom this deliverance prepared,) when <sup>13</sup> the people that walked in darkness have seen a great light : they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined. God is not only our light, as <sup>14</sup> "restoring us" outwardly "to gladness, freedom, happiness, whereof light is a symbol, as darkness is of sorrow, captivity, adversity, death." Scripture speaks of God, in a directer way, as being Himself our light. <sup>15</sup> The Lord is my light. <sup>16</sup> The Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light. He calls Himself, <sup>17</sup> The light of Israel. He is our light, by infusing knowledge, joy, heavenly brightness, in any outward lot. He does not say, "after darkness, comes light," but when I shall sit in darkness, then, the Lord is light unto me. The sitting in darkness is the occasion of the light, in that the soul or the people in sorrow turns to Him Who is their light. In their sin, which was so punished, they were turned away from the light.

9. I will bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against Him. This is the temper of all penitents, when stricken by God, or under chastisement from Him. <sup>18</sup> It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth Him good. <sup>19</sup> So let him curse, because the Lord hath said unto him, curse David. Who shall then say, Wherefore hast thou done so ? <sup>20</sup> He putteth his mouth in the dust ; if so be there may be hope. The penitent owns the just sentence of God, and, knowing that he deserves far more than God inflicts, is thankful to endure it, until He remove it, until He plead my cause and execute judgment for me, i. e. until God Himself think the punishments inflicted, enough, and judge between me and those through whose hands they come. The judgments which God righteously sends, and which man suffers righteously from Him, are unrighteously inflicted by those whose malice He overrules, whether it be that of evil men (as the Assyrian or the Chaldean or the Edomite) or of Satan. The close of the chastisements of His people is the beginning of the visible punishment of their misdeeds, who used amiss the power which God gave them over it. Whence it is said, <sup>21</sup> Daughter of Babylon, the wasted ! blessed he that rewardeth thee as thou hast served us. But all is of the mercy of God. So He saith, He shall bring me forth to the light of His Countenance and His favor and His truth. Micah speaks in the name of those who were penitent, and so were forgiven, and yet, in that they were under punishment, seemed to lie under the wrath of God. For, although God remits at once the eternal penalty of sin, yet we see daily, how punishment pursues the forgiven sinner, even to the end of life. The light of God's love may not, on grounds which He knoweth, shine unchecked upon him. We should not know the blackness of the offence of sin, and should never know the depth of God's mercy, but for our punishment. The indignation of God toward the penitent is an austere form of His love. So then penitents may well say, in every grief or sickness or visitation or disappointment, I will bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against Him. He says, I shall behold His righteousness, because they had a righteous cause against man, although not towards God, and God in His just judgment on their enemies shewed Himself as the righteous Judge of the world.

10. Then [And] she that is mine enemy shall see it, and shame shall cover her which said unto me, 'Where is He', He of Whom thou boastest, the Lord thy God? The cause of her gladness then is, that the blasphemies of the enemy of God were to cease. This was the bitterest portion of her cup, that they said daily, 'Where is now thy God? let Him come and save thee;' as though He could not, or as though He loved her not, and she vainly presumed on His help. Even when fallen, it was for His sake that she was hated, Who seemed to be overcome in her: as He was hated in His Martyrs, and they asked, "'Where is the God of the Christians?' Now the taunt was closed, and turned back on those who used it. The wheel, which they had turned against her, rolled round on themselves. They who had said, 'Let our eye look on Zion, now were ashamed that their hope had failed. They had longed to feed their sight on her miseries; Zion had her reverent gladness in gazing on the righteousness of God. Babylon was trodden down by the Medes and Persians, and they whom she had led captive beheld it. Daniel was in the palace, when Belshazzar was slain.

The soul of one, who has known the chastenings of God, cannot but read its own history here. The sinful soul is at once the object of the love of God and hath that about it which God hates. God hates the evil in us, even while He loves us, being, or having been, evil. He forgives, but chastens. His displeasure is the channel of His good-pleasure. Nathan said to David, 'The Lord hath put away thy sin, but also, the sword shall never depart from thy house. It is part of His forgiveness to cleanse the soul with a 'spirit of burning. "It seemeth to me," says St. Jerome, "that Jerusalem is every soul, which had been the temple of the Lord, and had had the vision of peace and the knowledge of Scripture, and which afterwards, overcome by sins, hath fallen captive by its own consent, parting from that which is right in the sight of God, and allowing itself to sink among the pleasures of the world." So then "captive, and tortured, she saith to Babylon, i. e. the confusion of this world and the power of the enemy which ruleth over the world, and sin who lordeth it over her, Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy; when I fall, I shall arise;" "from sin by repentance, and from tribulation by the consolation of the Holy Spirit, Who, after weeping, poureth in joy. For the Lord helpeth them that are fallen, and saith by the prophet, 'Shall they fall and not arise? and I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live. If I walk in darkness, the Lord is my light! For although the rulers of the darkness of this world have deceived me, and I sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, and my feet stumble upon the dark mountains, yet to them who sit in the region and shadow of death, light is sprung up, and light shineth in darkness, and the Lord is my light, and my salvation; whom then shall I fear? and I will speak to Him and will say, 'Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path.' "He draweth me from the darkness of ignorance and from the black night of sin, and giveth a clear view of future bliss, and brighteneth the very inmost soul within." "Even if a mist have come upon me and I have been in darkness, I too shall find the light, i. e. Christ; and the Sun of Righteousness arising on my mind shall make it white." I will bear patiently, yet gladly, the indignation of the Lord, "all adversity, trial, tribulation, persecution, which can happen in this life;" because I have sinned against Him, "and such is the enormity of sin, offered to the Majesty and dishonouring the Holiness of God, and such punishment doth it deserve in the world to come, that if we weigh it well, we shall bear with joy whatever adversity can befall us." "For although for a short time I be out of His Presence, and be given to an undistinguishing mind, yet, seeing I suffer this rejection justly, I will bear the judgment, for I am not chastened in vain." "All chastening for the present seemeth not to be joyous but grievous, nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them who are exercised thereby." "The soul, feeling that it hath sinned, and hath the wounds of sins and is living in dead flesh and needs the cautery, says firmly to the Physician, 'Burn my flesh, cut open my wounds, all my imposthumes. It was my fault, that I was wounded; be it my pain, to endure such sufferings and to regain health.' And the true Physician shews to her, when whole, the cause of His treatment, and that He did rightly what He did. Then after these sufferings, the soul, being brought out of outer darkness, saith, I shall behold His Righteousness, and say, 'Thou, O Lord, art upright; Righteous are Thy judgments, O God. But if Christ is made unto us wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption, he who, after the indignation of God, saith that he shall see His Righteousness, promiseth to himself the sight of Christ." "Then, having considered in her mind the grace of the righteousness in Christ and the overthrow of sin, the soul, in full possession of herself, crieth out, Mine enemy shall see it &c. For, after that Christ came unto us, justifying sinners through faith, the mouth of the ungodly One is stopped, and the Author of sin is put to shame. He hath lost his rule over us, and sin is trodden down, like mire in the streets, being subjected to the feet of the saints. But the blotting-out of sin is the Day of Christ." "And, because the end of all punishment is the beginning of good," God saith to the poor, penitent, tossed, soul, 'the walls of virtues shall be built up in thee, and thou shalt be guarded on all sides, and the rule of thine oppressors shall be far removed, and thy King and God shall come unto thee, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of God.' "All this shall be most fully seen in the Day of Judgment."

A day to build thy fences; [i. e. cometh;]

That day, far shall be the decree;

That day, and he shall come quite to thee<sup>2</sup>;

and there follows, in a longer but still remarkably measured and interrupted cadence<sup>3</sup>, the statement of the length and breadth from which the people shall come to her;

Up to and from Assyria and the cities of strong-land [Egypt;]

Up to and from strong-land and even to river [Euphrates;]

And sea from sea, and mountain to mountain.

It is not human might or strength which God promises to restore. He had before predicted, that the kingdom of the Messiah should stand, not through earthly strength<sup>4</sup>. He promises the restoration, not of city walls, but of the fence of the vineyard<sup>5</sup> of God, which God foretold by Isaiah that He would break down<sup>6</sup>. It is a peaceful renewal of her estate under God's protection, like that, with the promise whereof Amos closed his prophecy; 'In that day I will raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof. This decree, which he says shall be far away, might in itself be the decree either of God or of the enemy<sup>7</sup>. The sense is the same, since the enemy was but the instrument of God. Yet it seems more in accordance with the language of the prophets, that it should be the decree of man. For the decree of God for the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of His people was accomplished, held its course, was fulfilled. The destruction, captivity, restoration, were parts of one and the same decree of God, of which the restoration was the last accomplished in time. The restoration was not the removal, but the complete fulfilment, of the decree. He means then probably, that the decree of the enemy, whereby he held her captive, was to remove and be far off, not by any agency of her<sup>8</sup>. The people were to stream to her of themselves. One by one, shall all thy banished, captive, scattered, children be brought quite home unto thee from all parts of the earth, whither they have been driven, from Assyria, and from strong-land. The name Matsor, which he gives to Egypt, modifying its ordinary dual name Mitsraim, is meant, at once to signify "Egypt"<sup>9</sup> and to mark the strength of the country; as, in fact, "Egypt was on all sides by nature strongly guarded." A country, which was still strong relatively to Judah, would not, of itself, yield up its prey, but held it straitly; yet it should have to disgorge it. Isaiah and Hosea prophesied, in like way, the return of Israel and Judah from Assyria and from Egypt<sup>10</sup>. And from strong-land even to the river [Euphrates]; the ancient, widest, boundary of the promised land<sup>11</sup>; and from sea to sea, and from mountain to mountain. These last are too large to be the real boundaries of the land. If understood geographically, it would be narrowing those which had just been spoken of, from Egypt to the Euphrates. Joel likens the destruction of the Northern army to the perishing of locusts in the two opposite seas, the Dead sea and the Mediterranean<sup>12</sup>; but the Dead sea was not the entire Eastern boundary of all Israel. Nor are there any mountains on the South, answering to Mount Libanus on the North. Not the mountains of Edom which lay to the South-East, but the desert<sup>13</sup> was the Southern boundary of Judah. In the times too of their greatest prosperity, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Syria, had been subject to them. The rule of the Messiah from sea to sea had already been predicted by Solomon<sup>14</sup>, enlarging the boundaries of the promised land to the whole compass of the world, from the sea, their bound westward, to the further encircling sea beyond all habitable land, in which, in fact, our continents are large islands<sup>15</sup>. To this, Micah adds a new description, from mountain to mountain, including, probably, all subdivisions in our habitable earth, as the words, sea to sea, had embraced it as a whole. For, physically and to sight, mountains are the great natural divisions of our earth. Rivers are but a means of transit. The Euphrates and the Nile were the centres of the kingdoms which lay upon them. Each range of mountains, as it rises on the horizon, seems to present an insuperable barrier. No barrier should avail to hinder the inflow to the Gospel. As Isaiah foretold that all obstacles should be removed<sup>16</sup>, every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low, so Micah prophesies, from mountain to mountain they shall come.

The words are addressed as a promise and consolation to the Jews, and so, doubtless, the restoration of the Jews to their own land after the captivity is foretold here, as Micah had already foretold it<sup>17</sup>. But is the whole limited to this? He says, with remarkable indefiniteness, there shall come<sup>18</sup>. He does not say, who "shall come." But he twice sets two opposite boundaries, from which men should come; and, since these boundaries, not being coincident, cannot be predicted of one and the same subject, there must be two distinct incomings. The Jews were to come from those two countries,

וְיָמָיו וְעַד־הַיָּמִים וְעַד־הַיָּמִים וְעַד־הַיָּמִים
וְעַד־הַיָּמִים וְעַד־הַיָּמִים וְעַד־הַיָּמִים וְעַד־הַיָּמִים
וְעַד־הַיָּמִים וְעַד־הַיָּמִים וְעַד־הַיָּמִים וְעַד־הַיָּמִים
וְעַד־הַיָּמִים וְעַד־הַיָּמִים וְעַד־הַיָּמִים וְעַד־הַיָּמִים

<sup>4</sup> וְיָמָיו is the wall of a vineyard, Num. xxii. 34, Is. v. 5, Ps. lxxx. 13; a wall pushed down, Ps. lxii. 4; one in which a serpent might lurk, Eccl. x. 8; a wall with gaps in it, Ezek. xlii. 5, xlii. 30; the wall of the court of the temple, Ib. xlii. 7; a fence, Jer. ix. 9. It is no where used of "the wall of a city." וְיָמָיו too is the wall of the court of the temple, Ezek. xlii. 10; the wall of a vineyard, Prov. xxiv. 31. וְיָמָיו is "a sheepfold," Num. xxxii. 16, 24, 36, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4, Zeph. ii. 6; fences under which locusts lodge, Nah. iii. 17; in the open field, Jer. xlix. 3, Hos. ii. 8. Heb.: fences, Ps. lxxxix. 41. Heb. <sup>5</sup> Is. v. 5. <sup>6</sup> Is. x. 11.

<sup>7</sup> וְיָמָיו is used chiefly of a "statute" of God, either those positive laws given by Moses, (its common use) or such laws as God has impressed upon the physical world, Job xxvii. 19, xxviii. 26, xxxviii. 16, 26, Prov. viii. 29, Jer. v. 22, xxxii. 33, 8; of the time appointed by God for man's life, Job xiv. 5, 18; a decree of God, Job xxiii. 14, Ps. ii. 7, Zeph. ii. 2; of a portion of food appointed by God, Job xxiii. 12, Prov. xxx. 8, Ezek. xvi. 27; by man, Gen. xlvii. 23, Prov. xxxi. 15; of a statute made by man, Gen. xlvii. 23, 1 Sam.

xxx. 25; a custom, Jud. xi. 39, (Plur. Jer. xxxii. 11, Ez. xx. 18.); a task appointed by man, Ex. v. 14. But in all cases the idea of "appointment" is prominent; so that although וְיָמָיו expresses the law of God determining the bounds of the sea or the term of man's life, it cannot therefore signify a mere point in space or time. וְיָמָיו also, with which it is united by alliteration, (probably to fix the words in men's memories,) is not to "expand," but to "be far off." Then also וְיָמָיו, corresponding to וְיָמָיו which implies a future, must itself be a future, not a mere aorist or vivid present. These three observations together exclude such renderings as, "the decree for thy restoration shall be pronounced far and wide;" "the decree of God shall not be confined to Babylon but shall extend to other countries." "In that day, the interval is distant;" (Ew.) "the bound set to her will be far off," i. e. Israel shall be enlarged.

whither its people were then to be carried captive or would flee. From the boundaries of the world, the world was to come.

Thus Micah embraces in one the prophecies, which are distinct in Isaiah, that not only God's former people should come from Egypt and Assyria, but that Egypt and Assyria themselves should be counted as one with Israel<sup>1</sup>; and while, in the first place, the restoration of Israel itself is foretold, there follows that conversion of the world, which Micah had before promised<sup>2</sup>, and which was the object of the restoration of Israel. This was fulfilled to Jews and heathen together, when the dispersed of the Jews were gathered into one in Christ, the Son of David according to the flesh, and the Gospel, beginning at Jerusalem, was spread abroad among all nations. The promise is thrice repeated, It is the day, assuring the truth thereof, as it were, in the Name of the All-Holy Trinity.

13. Notwithstanding [And] the land (i. e. that spoken of, the land of Judah) shall be desolate, not through any arbitrary law or the might of her enemies, but through the sins of the people, because of them that dwell therein, for the fruit of their doings. Truly "the fruit of their doings," what they did to please themselves, of their own minds against God. As they sow, so shall they reap. This sounds almost as a riddle and contradiction beforehand; "the walls built up," "the people gathered in," and "the land desolate." Yet it was all fulfilled in the letter as well as in spirit. Jerusalem was restored; the people was gathered, first from the captivity, then to Christ; and yet the land was again desolate through the fruit of their doings who rejected Christ, and is so until this day.

The prophet now closes with one earnest prayer<sup>3</sup>; to which he receives a brief answer, that God would shew forth His power anew, as when He first made them His people<sup>4</sup>. On this, he describes vividly the awed submission of the world to their God<sup>5</sup>, and closes with a thanksgiving of marvelling amazement at the greatness and completeness of the forgiving mercy of God<sup>6</sup>, ascribing all to His free goodness<sup>7</sup>.

14. Feed Thy people with Thy rod. The day of final deliverance was still a great way off. There was a weary interval before them of chastisement, suffering, captivity. So Micah lays down his pastoral office by committing his people to Him Who was their true and abiding Shepherd. Who that has had the pastoral office, has not thought, as the night drew nigh in which no man can work, 'what will be after him?' Micah knew and foretold the outline. It was for his people a passing through the valley of the shadow of death. Micah then commits them to Him, Who had Himself committed them to him, Who alone could guide them through it. It is a touching parting with his people; a last guidance of those whom he had taught, reproved, rebuked, in vain, to Him the Good Shepherd Who led Israel like a flock. The rod is at times the shepherd's staff<sup>8</sup>, although more frequently the symbol of chastisement. God's chastisement of His people is an austere form of His love. So He says, "If his children forsake My law, I will visit their offences with a rod and their sin with scourges: nevertheless My loving-kindness will I not utterly take from them.

The flock of Thine inheritance. So Moses had appealed to God,<sup>10</sup> Destroy not Thy people and Thine inheritance which Thou hast redeemed through Thy greatness—They are Thy people and Thine inheritance; and Solomon, in his dedication-prayer, that, on their repentance in their captivity, God would forgive His people,<sup>11</sup> for they be Thy people and Thine inheritance which Thou broughtest forth out of Egypt; and Asaph,<sup>12</sup> O Lord, the heathen are come into Thine inheritance; and again,<sup>13</sup> Why doth Thine anger smoke against the sheep of Thy pasture? Remember the tribe of Thine inheritance which Thou hast redeemed; and Joel,<sup>14</sup> Spare Thy people and give not Thine heritage to reproach; and a Psalmist,<sup>15</sup> They break in pieces Thy people, O Lord, and afflict Thine heritage; and Isaiah,<sup>16</sup> Return for thy servants' sake, the tribes of Thine inheritance. The appeal excludes all merits. Not for any deserts of their's, (for these were but evil,) did the Prophets teach them to pray; but because they were God's property. It was His Name, which would be dishonoured in them; it was His work, which would seemingly come to nothing; it was He, Who would be thought powerless to save. Again, it is not God's way, to leave half-done what He has begun. "Jesus, having loved His own which were in the world, loved them unto the end. God's love in creating us and making us His, is the earnest, if we will, of His everlasting love. We have been the objects of His everlasting thought, of His everlasting love. Though we have forfeited all claim to His love, He has not forfeited the work of His Hands; Jesus has not forfeited the price of His Blood. So holy men have prayed; "I believe that Thou hast redeemed me by Thy Blood: permit not the price of the Ransom to perish." "O Jesu Christ, my only Saviour, let not Thy most bitter Passion and Death be lost or wasted in me, miserable sinner!"

Which dwell solitarily, or alone. Micah uses the words of Balaam, when he had been constrained by God to bless Israel.<sup>20</sup> The people shall dwell alone and shall not be reckoned among the nations. Moses had repeated them,<sup>21</sup> Israel shall dwell in safety alone. This aloneness among other nations, then, was a blessing, springing from God's being in the midst of them<sup>22</sup>, the deeds which He did for them<sup>23</sup>, the law which He gave them<sup>24</sup>. So Moses prayed,<sup>25</sup> Wherein shall it be known here, that I and Thy people have found grace in Thy sight? is it not in that Thou goest with us? So shall we be separated, I and Thy people, from all the people that are on the face of the earth. It was, then, a separate appeal to God by all His former loving-kindness, whereby He had severed and elected His people for Himself.

time used the like image, that Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field [Carmel], and the fruitful field [Carmel] shall be esteemed as a forest<sup>1</sup>. The wild forest was to be like the rich domestic exuberance of Carmel<sup>2</sup>. He would say, "Feed Thy people in Babylon, which is to them a wild homeless tract, that it may be to them as their own peaceful Carmel." Without God, all the world is a wilderness; with God, the wilderness is Paradise.

Let them feed in Bashan and Gilead. The former words were a prayer for their restoration. Gilead and Bashan were the great pasture-countries of Palestine<sup>3</sup>, "a wide table-land, with undulating downs clothed with rich grass throughout," where the cattle ranged freely. They were the first possessions, which God had bestowed upon Israel; the first, which they forfeited. Micah prays that God, Who protected them in their desolation, would restore and protect them in the green pasture where He placed them. They are a prayer still to the Good Shepherd Who laid down His life for His sheep<sup>4</sup>, our Lord Jesus Christ, that He would feed His flock whom He has redeemed, who have been given to Him as an inheritance<sup>5</sup>, the little flock<sup>6</sup>, to which it is the Father's good pleasure to give the kingdom, which cleaveth to Him and shall be heirs with Him<sup>7</sup>. "Christ feedeth His own with a rod, guiding them gently, and repressing by gentle fears the tendency of believers to listlessness. He bruiseth as with a rod of iron, not them, but the rebellious disobedient and proud, who receive not the faith; believers He instructs and forms tenderly, feeds them among the lilies, and leads them into good pastures and rich places, namely the Divinely-inspired Scriptures, making the hidden things thereof clear through the Spirit to those of understanding, that they may grow up unto Him in all things which is the Head, even Christ, with minds well-fed and nourished and gladdened with all spiritual delights. But the chosen and elect dwell solitarily, being apart from the rest who think only of the things of earth, and give themselves to the pleasures of sense. So then these, having the mind at rest, freed from the vain and abominable tumults, are placed apart as in a wood and in a mountain. By the wood you may understand, the rich and varied and solid instruction (as it were trees and flowers) both in doctrine and life; by the mountain, what is high and lofty. For none of the wisdom, accounted of in the Church, is low. They are fed in Bashan and Gilead, as in the days of old, rich pastures; for the mind of the holy is beautified, delighting itself in the contemplation of the inspired Scriptures, and filled, as it were, with a certain richness, and shares without stint all excellence in thought or in deed; and that, not for a brief and narrow season, but for ever. For what gladdeneth the flesh falleth therewith and fadeth and hasteth away like a shadow; but the participation of the good things from above and of the Spirit, stretcheth out along endless ages."

15. According to the days of thy coming out of the land of Egypt. God answers the prayer, beginning with its closing words<sup>8</sup>. Micah had prayed, "Turn Thy people like the days of old<sup>9</sup>;" God answers, "like the days of thy coming<sup>10</sup> out of the land of Egypt." Micah had said, in the name of his people, I shall behold His righteousness; God answers, I will make him to behold marvellous things. The word marvellous things<sup>11</sup> was used of God's great marvels in the physical world<sup>12</sup>, or the marvellous mercies of His Providence towards individuals or nations<sup>13</sup>, and especially of those great miracles, which were accumulated at the deliverance from Egypt<sup>14</sup>, and the entrance of the promised land<sup>15</sup> which was its completion. The reference to the Exodus must have led them to think of actual miracles; since, in regard to the Exodus, it is used of nothing else. But there were no miracles at the return from the captivity. When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, said a Psalmist of the returned people, we were like them that dream. The Lord hath done great things for us; we are glad. Great things, but not miraculous. The promise then kept the people looking onward, until He came, a Prophet mighty in word and deed, as to Whom St. Peter appealed to the people, that He was approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by Him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know; Who gave also to them who believed on Him power to do greater works than He did, through His own power, because He went to His Father; and when they believed, He shewed to him, viz. to the whole people gathered into the One Church, Jew and Gentile, yet more marvellous things, things, every way more marvellous and beyond nature than those of old, the unsearchable riches of Christ, the mystery which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God.

16. The nations shall see. God had answered, what He would give to His own people, to see. Micah takes up the word<sup>16</sup>, and says, what effect this sight should have upon the enemies of God and of His people. The world should still continue to be divided between the people of God and their adversaries. Those who are converted pass from the one to the other; but the contrast remains. Assyria, Babylon, Egypt, pass away or become subject to other powers; but the antagonism continues. The nations are they, who, at each time, waste, oppress, are arrayed against, the people of God. When the Gospel came into the world, the whole world was arrayed against it<sup>17</sup>. These then, he says, shall see, i. e. the marvellous works of God, which God should shew His people, and be ashamed at, i. e. because of all their might, their own might. They put forth their whole might, and it failed them against the marvellous might of God. They should array might against might, and be ashamed at the failure of all their might<sup>1</sup>. The word all is very emphatic; it implies that they had put forth all, and that all had failed them, and proved to be weakness. So the Heathen might was often put to shame and gnashed its teeth, when it could avail nothing against the strength to endure which God gave to His martyrs. Its strength to inflict and to crush was baffled before the hidden might of God's Spirit. They shall lay their hand upon their mouth, in token that they were reduced to silence, having no more to say<sup>2</sup>; for He promised, I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor resist; and they had to own, indeed a notable miracle hath been done by them, and we cannot deny it. Their ears shall be deaf; they shall be silent, as though they had heard nothing, as if they were both dumb and deaf<sup>3</sup>. Yet it seems too that they are wilfully deaf, shutting their ears out of envy and hatred, that they might not hear what great things God had done for His people, nor hear the voice of truth and be converted and healed. <sup>4</sup> "The nations and the Emperors of the nations saw, Jews and Gentiles saw, and were ashamed at all their might, because their might, great as it was accounted, upheld by laws and arms, could not overcome the mighty works, which the Good Shepherd did among His people or flock by His rod, i. e. by His power, through weak and despised persons, the aged, or oftentimes even by boys and girls. They were then ashamed at all their might which could only touch the earthen vessels, but could not take away the treasure which was in them. What shall I say of the wisdom of those same nations? Of this too they were ashamed, as he adds, They shall put their hands upon their mouths. For, in comparison with the heavenly wisdom, which spake by them and made their tongues eloquent, dumb was all secular eloquence, owning by its silence that it was convicted and confounded."

17. They shall lick the dust like a [the] serpent. To lick the dust, by itself, pictures the extreme humility of persons who cast themselves down to the very earth<sup>5</sup>. To lick it "like the serpent" seems rather to represent the condition of those who share the serpent's doom<sup>6</sup>, whose lot, viz. earth and things of earth, they had chosen<sup>7</sup>. They shall move out of their holes, or, better, shall tremble, (i. e. "come tremblingly,") out of their close places<sup>8</sup>, whether these be strong places or prisons, as the word, varied in one vowel<sup>9</sup>, means. If it be strong places, it means, that <sup>10</sup> "the enemies of God's people should, in confusion and tumultuously with fear, leave their strong holds, wherein they thought to be secure, not able to lift themselves up against God and those by Him sent against them." Like worms of the earth, lit. creeping things, or, as we say, reptiles<sup>11</sup>, contemptuously. They shall be afraid of, or rather come trembling to, the Lord our God; it is not said their, but our God, Who hath done so great things for us. And shall fear because of [lit. from] Thee, O Lord, of Whom they had before said, Where is the Lord thy God?

It is doubtful, whether these last words express a "servile fear," whereby a man turns away and flees from<sup>12</sup> the person or thing which he fears, or whether they simply describe fear of God<sup>13</sup>, the first step towards repentance. In Hosea's words<sup>14</sup>, they shall fear towards the Lord and His goodness, the addition, and His goodness, determines the character of the fear. In Micah, it is not said that the fear brings them into any relation to God. He is not spoken of, as becoming, any how, their God, and Micah closes by a thanksgiving, for God's pardoning mercy, not to them but to His people.

And so the Prophet ends, as he began, with the judgments of God; to those who would repent, chastisement, to the impenitent, punishment: "sentencing Samaria, guilty and not repenting<sup>15</sup>, to perpetual captivity; to Jerusalem, guilty but repenting, promising restoration. So from the beginning of the world did God; so doth He; so shall He unto the end. So did He shew Himself to Cain and Abel, who both, as we all, sinned in Adam. Cain, being impenitent, He wholly cast away; Abel, being penitent," and through faith offering a better sacrifice than Cain, and "bringing forth fruits worthy of repentance," He accepted. So He hath foreshewn as to the end<sup>17</sup>. <sup>16</sup> "And that we may know how uniformly our Judge so distinguisheth, at the very moment of His own Death while hanging between the two thieves, the one, impenitent and blaspheming, He left; to the other, penitent and confessing, He opened the gate of paradise; and, soon after, leaving the Jewish people unrepentant, He received the repentance of the Gentiles." Thus the Prophet parts with both out of sight; the people of God, feeding on the rich bounty and abundance of God, and His marvellous gifts of grace above and beyond nature, multiplied to them above all the wonders of old time; the enemies of God's people looking on, not to admire, but to be ashamed, not to be healthfully ashamed, but to be wilfully deaf to the voice of God. For, however to lay the hand on the mouth might be a token of reverent silence, the deafness of the ears can hardly be other than the emblem of hardened obstinacy. What follows, then, seems more like the unwilling creeping-forth into the Presence of God, when they cannot keep away, than conversion. It seems to picture the reprobate, who would not<sup>18</sup> hear the Voice of the Son of God and live, but who, in the end, shall be forced to hear it out of their close places or prisons, i. e. the grave, and come forth in fear, when they shall <sup>1</sup> say to the mountains, Fall on us; and to the hills, Cover us. Thus the Prophet brings us to the close of all things, the gladness and joy of God's people, the terror of His enemies, and adds only the song of thanksgiving of all the redeemed.

<sup>1</sup> This is the force of np with ps. ps designates, as usual, the cause and source of the shame; and mostly with this aggravation, that they had trusted in it, and it had failed them. See Hos. iv. 19, "they shall be ashamed because of their sacrifices; x. 6, because of their own counsel" (see ab. pp. 64, 72. on x. 6); "They shall be afraid and ashamed because of Ethiopia, their expectation, and of Egypt, their glory," Is. xx. 5; "because of the oaks, which ye have desired," Ib. i. 29; "thou shalt be ashamed because of Egypt, as thou wast ashamed because of Assyria," Jer. ii. 36; "Moab shall be ashamed because of Chemosh, as the house of Israel was ashamed because of Bethel their confidence," Ib. xlviii. 18; add xli. 18. The idiom itself, np with ps, "ashamed because of their might," occurs in Ezek. xxxii. 30, of the nations, which had perished in war. In a few cases, the idiom is used of the source of shame, where the idea of previous trust in them is less prominent, as in Ezek. xxxvi. 22, Zeph. iii. 11. But here, this is involved in the subject itself, and

18. Who is a God (and, as the word means, A Mighty God,) like unto Thee? He saith not, <sup>2</sup> Who hast made heaven and earth, the sea and all that therein is; nor, <sup>3</sup> Who telleth the number of the stars; and calleth them all by their names; nor, <sup>4</sup> Who by His strength setteth fast the mountains and is girded about with power; but Who forgivest! For greater is the work of Redemption than the work of Creation. That pardoneth, and beareth and taketh away also, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of His heritage, i. e. His heritage, which is a remnant still when <sup>5</sup> the rest are blinded; and this, not of its merits but of His mercy; since it is not His nature to retain His anger for ever; not for any thing in them, but because He delighteth in mercy, as He saith, <sup>6</sup> I am merciful, saith the Lord, and I will not keep anger for ever. <sup>7</sup> I am He that blotteth out thy transgressions for Mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins. <sup>8</sup> For although God for a time is angry with His elect, chastening them mercifully in this life, yet in the end He hath compassion on them, giving them everlasting consolations."

Moses, after the completion of his people's deliverance at the Red Sea, used the like appeal to God, in unmingled joy. Then the thanksgiving ran, <sup>9</sup> glorious in holiness, awful in praises, doing wonders. Now, it ran in a more subdued, yet even deeper, tone, taken from God's revelation of Himself after that great transgression on Mount Sinai, <sup>10</sup> forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin. With this, Micah identified his own name <sup>11</sup>. This was the one message which he loved above all to proclaim; of this, his own name was the herald to his people in his day. Who is like the Lord, the Pardoner of sin, the Redeemer from its guilt, the Subduer of its power? For no false god was ever such a claim made. The heathen gods were symbols of God's workings in nature; they were, at best, representatives of His Government and of His displeasure at sin. But, being the creatures of man's mind, they could not freely pardon, for man dared not ascribe to them the attribute of a freely-pardoning mercy, for which he dared not hope. Who is a God like to Thee, mighty, not only to destroy but to pardon? is the wondering thanksgiving of time, the yet greater amazement of eternity, as eternity shall unveil the deep blackness of sin over-against the light of God, and we, seeing God, as He is, shall see what that Holiness is, against which we sinners sinned. The soul, which is truly penitent, never wearies of the wondering love, Who is a God like unto Thee?

cob and Abraham; in Jacob, all to whom the promise was first made; in Abraham, all nations of the world who should be blessed in his Seed, through the mercy of God overflowing the bounds of that covenant. Isaac is, in his sacrifice, chiefly a type of our Lord Himself.

Which Thou hast sworn unto our fathers. <sup>1</sup>That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation.

From the days of old. <sup>2</sup>From eternity, in the counsel of God; in promise, from the foundation of the world, as is said in the hymn of Zacharias<sup>3</sup>, As He spake by the mouth of His holy Prophets, which have been since the world began. <sup>4</sup>The inspired hymns of the Blessed Virgin Mary and of Zachariah take up the words of the prophet, and shew that they are already fulfilled in Christ, although they shall be more and more fulfilled unto the world's end, as Jew and Gentile are brought into His fold; <sup>5</sup>He remembering His mercy, as He spake to our fathers, to Abraham and to his seed for ever. <sup>6</sup>To perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember

His holy covenant, the oath which He sware to our father Abraham that He would grant unto us.

THE PROPHET NAHUM.

THE prophecy of Nahum is both the complement and the counterpart of the book of Jonah. When Moses had asked God to shew him His glory, and God had promised to let him see the outskirts of that glory, and to proclaim the Name of the Lord before him, the Lord, we are told, passed by before him and proclaimed, "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, longsuffering and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty." God proclaimed at once His mercy and His justice. Those wondrous words echo along the whole of the Old Testament. Moses himself<sup>a</sup>, David<sup>b</sup>, other Psalmists<sup>c</sup>, Jeremiah<sup>d</sup>, Daniel<sup>e</sup>, Nehemiah<sup>f</sup>, plead them to God or rehearse some part of them in thanksgiving. Joel repeated them as a motive to repentance<sup>g</sup>. Upon the repentance of Nineveh, Jonah had recited to God the bright side of that His declaration of Himself, "I knew that Thou art a gracious God and merciful, slow to anger and of great goodness," repeating to God His words to Moses, and adding, and repenting of the evil. Nineveh, as appears from Nahum, had fallen back into the violence of which it had repented. Nahum then, in reference to that declaration of Jonah, begins by setting forth the awful side of the attributes of God. First, in a stately rhythm, which, in the original, reminds us of the gradual Psalms, he enunciates the solemn threefold declaration of the severity of God to those who will be His enemies.

*"A jealous God and Avenger is the Lord;
An Avenger is the Lord, and lord of wrath;
An Avenger is the Lord to His adversaries;
And a Reserver of wrath to His enemies."*

Then, he too recites that character of mercy recorded by Moses, "The Lord is slow to anger, and great in power." But anger, although slow, comes, he adds, not the less certainly on the guilty; and will not at all clear the guilty. The iniquity is full. As a whole, there is no place more for repentance. Nineveh had had its prophet, and had been spared, and had sunk back into its old sins. The office of Nahum is to pronounce its sentence. That sentence is fixed. "There is no healing of thy bruise." Nothing is said of its ulterior conversion or restoration. On the contrary, Nahum says, "He will make the place thereof an utter desolation."

The sins of Nineveh spoken of by Nahum are the same as those from which they had turned at the preaching of Jonah. In Jonah, it is, "the violence of their hands." Nahum describes Nineveh as "a dwelling of lions, filled with prey and with ravine, the feeding-place of young lions, where the lion tore enough for his whelps; a city of bloods, full of lies and robbery, from which the prey departeth not."

But, amid this mass of evil, one was eminent, in direct antagonism to God. The character is very peculiar. It is not simply of rebellion against God, or neglect of Him. It is a direct disputing of His Sovereignty. The prophet twice repeats the characteristic expression, "What will ye devise so vehemently against the Lord?" "devising evil against the Lord;" and adds, counsellor of evil. This was exactly the character of Sennacherib, whose wars, like those of his forefathers, (as appears from the cuneiform inscriptions<sup>h</sup>), were religious wars, and who blasphemously compared God to the local deities of the countries, which his forefathers or himself had destroyed<sup>i</sup>. Of this enemy Nahum speaks, as having "gone forth;" out of thee (Nineveh) hath gone forth one, devising evil against the Lord, a counsellor of Belial. This was past. Their purpose was inchoate, yet incomplete. God challenges them, "What will ye devise so vehemently against the Lord?" The destruction too is proximate. The prophet answers for God, "He Himself, by Himself, is already making an utter end." To Jerusalem he turns, "And now I will break his yoke from off thee, and will break his bonds asunder." Twice the prophet mentions the device against God; each time he answers it by the prediction of the sudden utter destruction of the enemy, while in the most perfect security. "While they are intertwined as thorns, and swallowed up as their drink, they are devoured as stubble fully dry; and, if they be perfect, unimpaired in their strength, and thus many, even thus shall they be mown down." Their destruction was to be, as their numbers, complete. With no previous loss, secure and at ease, a mighty host, in consequence of their prosperity, all were, at one blow, mown down; "and he (their king, who counselled against the Lord) shall pass away and perish. "The abundance of the wool in the fleece is no hindrance to the shears," nor of the grass to the scythe, nor of the Assyrian host to the will of the Lord. After he, the chief, had thus passed away, Nahum foretells that remarkable death, in connection with the house of his gods; "Out of the house of thy gods I will cut off the graven image and the molten image: I will make thy grave." There is no natural construction of these words, except, I will make it thy grave<sup>a</sup>. Judah too was, by the presence of the Assyrian, hindered from going up to worship at Jerusalem. The prophet bids proclaim peace to Jerusalem; keep thy feasts—for the wicked shall no more pass through thee. It was then by the presence of the wicked, that they were now hindered from keeping their feasts, which could be kept only at Jerusalem.

The prophecy of Nahum coincides then with that of Isaiah, when Hezekiah prayed against Sennacherib. In the history<sup>a</sup>, and in the prophecy of Isaiah, the reproach and blasphemy and rage against God are prominent, as an evil design against God is in Nahum. In Isaiah we have the messengers sent to blaspheme<sup>b</sup>; in Nahum, the promise, that the voice of thy messengers shall no more be heard. Isaiah prophesies the fruitlessness of his attempt against Jerusalem<sup>c</sup>; his disgraced return; his violent death in his own land<sup>d</sup>; Nahum prophesies the entire destruction of his army, his own passing away, his grave. Isaiah, in Jerusalem, foretells how the spontaneous fruits of the earth shall be restored to them<sup>e</sup>, and so, that they shall have possession of the open country; Nahum, living probably in the country, foretells the free access to Jerusalem, and bids them to keep their feasts, and perform the vows, which, in their trouble, they had promised to God. He does not only foretell that they may, but he enjoins them to do it. The words, the emptiers have emptied them out and marred their vinebranches, may relate to the first expedition of Sennacherib, when, Holy Scripture says, he "came up against all the fenced cities of Judah and took them, and Hezekiah gave him thirty talents of gold, and 300 talents of silver." Sennacherib himself says<sup>f</sup>, "Hezekiah, king of Judah, who had not submitted to my authority, forty-six of his principal cities, and fortresses and villages depending upon them of which I took no account, I captured, and carried away their spoil. And from these places I captured and carried off as spoil 200,150 people," &c. This must relate to the first expedition, on account of the exact correspondence of the tribute in gold, with a variation in the number of the talents of silver, easily accounted for<sup>g</sup>. In the first invasion Sennacherib relates that he besieged Jerusalem. "Hezekiah himself I shut up in Jerusalem his capital city, like a bird in a cage, building towers round the city to fence him in, and raising banks of earth against the gates, so as to prevent escape." It is perhaps in reference to this, that, in the second invasion, God promises by Isaiah; "He shall not come into this city, and shall not shoot an arrow there; and shall not present shield before it, and shall not cast up bank against it." Still, in this second invasion also, Holy Scripture relates, that "the king of Assyria sent Rabshakeh from Lachish to Jerusalem unto king Hezekiah with a great army."

Perhaps it is in regard to this second expedition, that God says, "Though I have afflicted thee, I will afflict thee no more; i. e. this second invasion should not desolate her, like that first. Not that God absolutely would not again afflict her, but not now. The yoke of the Assyrian was then broken, until the fresh sins of Manasseh drew down their own punishment.

Nahum then was a prophet for Judah, or for that remnant of Israel, which, after the ten tribes were carried captive, became one with Judah, not in temporal sovereignty, but in the one worship of God. His mention of Basan, Carmel and Lebanon alone, as places lying under the rebuke of God, perhaps implies a special interest in Northern Palestine. Judah may have already become the name for the whole people of God who were left in their own land, since those of the ten tribes who remained had now no separate religious or political existence. The idol-centre of their worship was gone into captivity.

With this agrees the old tradition as to the name of the birth-place of Nahum, the Elkoshite. "Some think," says St. Jerome<sup>h</sup>, "that Elcesæus was the father of Nahum, and, according to the Hebrew tradition, was also a prophet; whereas Elcesi<sup>i</sup> is even to this day a little village in Galilee, small indeed, and scarcely indicating by its ruins the traces of ancient buildings, yet known to the Jews, and pointed out to me too by my guide." The name is a genuine Hebrew name, the El, with which it begins, being the name of God, which appears in the names of other towns also, as, El'ale, Eltolad, Elteke, Eltolem. The author of the shortlived Gnostic heresy of the Elcesaites, called Elkesai, êlksai, êlxai, êlxaios, Elkasaios<sup>j</sup>, probably had his name from that same village. Eusebius mentions Êlkesc, as the place "whence was Nahum the Elkesæan." S. Cyril of Alexandria says, that Elkesæ was a village somewhere in Judæa.

On the other hand Alcush, a town in Mosul, is probably a name of Arabic origin, and is not connected with Nahum by any extant or known writer, earlier than Masius towards the end of the 16th century<sup>k</sup>, and an Arabic scribe in 1713<sup>l</sup>. Neither of these mention the tomb. "The tomb," says Layard<sup>m</sup>, "is a simple plaster box, covered with green cloth, and standing at the upper end of a large chamber. The house containing the tomb is a modern building. There are no inscriptions, nor fragments of any antiquity near the place." The place is now revered by the Jews, but in the 12th century Benjamin of Tudela<sup>n</sup> supposed his tomb to be at Ain Japhata, South of Babylon. Were anything needed to invalidate statements above 2000 years after the time of Nahum, it might suffice that the Jews, who are the authors of this story, maintain that not Jonah only but Obadiah and Jephthah the Gileadite are also buried at Mosul<sup>o</sup>. Nor were the ten tribes placed there, but "in the cities of the Medes." The name Capernaum, "the village of Nahum," is probably an indication of his residence in Galilee. There is nothing in his language peculiar to the Northern tribes. One very poetic word<sup>p</sup>, common to him with the song of Deborah, is not therefore a "provincialism," because it only happens to occur in the rich, varied, language of two prophets of North Pa-

The conquest of No-Ammon or Thebes and the captivity of its inhabitants, of which Nahum speaks, must have been by Assyria itself. Certainly it was not from domestic disturbances<sup>2</sup>; for Nahum says, that the people were carried away captive<sup>3</sup>. Nor was it from the Ethiopians<sup>4</sup>; for Nahum speaks of them, as her allies<sup>5</sup>. Nor from the Carthaginians<sup>6</sup>; for the account of Ammianus<sup>7</sup>, that "when first Carthage was beginning to expand itself far and wide, the Punic generals, by an unexpected inroad, subdued the hundred-gated Thebes," is merely a mistaken gloss on a statement of Diodorus, that "Hanno took Hekatompylos by siege;" a city, according to Diodorus himself<sup>8</sup>, "in the desert of Libya." Nor was it from the Scythians<sup>9</sup>; for Herodotus, who alone speaks of their maraudings and who manifestly exaggerates them, expressly says, that Psammetichus induced the Scythians by presents not to enter Egypt<sup>10</sup>; and a wandering predatory horde does not besiege or take strongly fortified towns. There remain then only the Assyrians. Four successive Assyrian Monarchs, Sargon, his son, grandson and great grandson, Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, Asshur-bani-pal, from B.C. 718 to about B.C. 657, conquered in Egypt<sup>11</sup>. The hostility was first provoked by the encouragement given by Sabacho the Ethiopian (Sab<sup>12</sup>, in the cuneiform inscriptions, S b k, in Egyptian), the So of Holy Scripture<sup>13</sup>, to Hoshea to rebel against Shalmaneser<sup>14</sup>. Sargon, who, according to his own statement, was the king who actually took Samaria<sup>15</sup>, led three expeditions of his own against Egypt. In the first, Sargon defeated the Egyptian king in the battle of Raphia<sup>16</sup>; in the second, in his seventh year, he boasts that Pharaoh became his tributary<sup>17</sup>; in a third, which is placed three years later, Ethiopia submitted to him<sup>18</sup>. A seal of Sabaco has been found at Koyunjik, which, as has been conjectured<sup>19</sup>, was probably annexed to a treaty. The capture of Ashdod by the Tartan of Sargon, recorded by Isaiah<sup>20</sup>, was probably in the second expedition, when Sargon deposed its king Azuri, substituting his brother Akhimit<sup>21</sup>: the rebellion of Ashdod probably occasioned the third expedition, in which, as it seems, Isaiah's prophecy was fulfilled, that Egyptians and Ethiopians, young and old, should be carried captive by the king of Assyria. The king of Ashdod, Yaman, is related to have fled to Egypt, which was subject to Merukha or Meroe; and to have been delivered up by the king of Meroe who himself fled to some unnamed desert afar, a march of (it is conjectured) months<sup>22</sup>. The king of Meroe, first, from times the most distant, became tributary. "His forefathers had not" in all that period "sent to the kings my ancestors to ask for peace and to acknowledge the power of Merodach." The fact, that his magnificent palace, "one of the few remains of external decoration," Layard says<sup>23</sup>, "with which we are acquainted in Assyrian architecture," "seems" according to Mr Fergusson<sup>24</sup>, "at first sight almost purely Egyptian," implies some lengthened residence in Egypt or some capture of Egyptian artists.

Of Sennacherib, the son of Sargon, Josephus writes, "Berosus, the historian of the Chaldee affairs, mentions the king Sennacherib, and that he reigned over the Assyrians, and that he warred against all Asia and Egypt, saying as follows." The passage of Berosus itself is wanting, whether Josephus neglected to fill it in, or whether it has been subsequently lost; but neither Chaldee nor Egyptian writers record expeditions which were reverses; and although Berosus was a Babylonian, not an Assyrian, yet the document, which he used, must have been Assyrian. In the second expedition of Sennacherib, Rabshakeh, in his message to Hezekiah, says, "Behold thou trustest upon the staff of this bruised reed, upon Egypt." The expression is remarkable. He does not speak of Egypt, as a power, weak, frail, failing, but, passively, as crushed<sup>1</sup> by another. It is the same word and image which he uses in his prophecy of our Lord, a bruised reed (kaneh ratsuts) shall He not break, i. e. He shall not break that which is already bruised. The word implies, then, that the king of Egypt had already received some decided blow before the second expedition of Sennacherib. The annals of Sennacherib's reign, still preserved in his inscriptions, break off in the eighth of his twenty-two years<sup>2</sup>, and do not extend to the time of this second expedition against Hezekiah<sup>3</sup>. Nor does Holy Scripture say, in what year this 2nd expedition took place. In this he defeated "the kings of Egypt and the king of Meroe at Altakou [Elteke] and Tamna [Timnatha]."

Sennacherib's son Esarhaddon appears for the time to have subdued Egypt and Ethiopia, and to have held them as kingdoms dependent on himself. "He acquired Egypt and the inner parts of Asia," is the brief statement of Abydenus<sup>4</sup>: (i. e. of Berosus.) "He established" (his son relates) "twenty kings, satraps, governors in Egypt," among which can be recognised Necho, (the father of Psammetichus) king of Memphis and Sais; a king of Tanis, or Zoan (now Sān); Natho (or, according to another copy, Sept), Hanes, Sebennytus, Mendes, Bubastis, Siyout or Lycopolis, Chemmis, Tinis, and No. These were all subordinate kings; for so he entitles each separately in the list, although he sums up the whole, "These are the names of the Kings, Pechahs, Satraps who in Egypt obeyed my father who begat me." Tearcho or Taracho himself, "king of Egypt and Ethiopia," was in like way subject to Esarhaddon. The account of the revolt, which his son Asshur-bani-pal quelled, implies also a fixed settlement in Egypt. The 20 kings were involved in the rebellion through fear of Taracho, but there is notice of other servants of Esarhaddon who remained faithful and were maltreated by Taracho<sup>5</sup>. Asshur-bani-pal says also, that he strengthened his former garrisons<sup>6</sup>. One expedition of Esarhaddon (probably towards the close of his reign, since he does not mention it in his own annals which extend over eight years) is related by his son Asshur-bani-pal. "He defeated Tirhakah in the lower country, after which, proceeding Southwards, he took the city, where the Ethiopian held his court," and assumed the title, "king of the kings of Egypt and conqueror of Ethiopia." On another inscription in a palace built for his son, at Tarbis, now Sherif-khan, he entitles himself "king of the kings of Egypt, Pathros, Ethiopia." We do not, however, find the addition, which appears to recur upon every conquest of a people not before conquered by Assyria, "which the kings, my fathers, had not subdued." This addition is so regular, that the absence of it, in itself, involves a strong probability of a previous conquest of the country.

The subdual apparently was complete. They revolted at the close of the reign of Esarhaddon (as his son Asshur-bani-pal relates) from fear of Tarach<sup>o</sup> rather than from any wish of their own to regain independence. Asshur-bani-pal accordingly, after the defeat of Tarach<sup>o</sup>, forgave and restored them<sup>a</sup>. Even the second treacherous revolt was out of fear, lest Tarach<sup>o</sup> shall return<sup>a</sup>, upon the withdrawal of the Assyrian armies. This second revolt and perhaps a subsequent revolt of Urdamanie<sup>b</sup> a stepson of Tarach<sup>o</sup>, who succeeded him, Asshur-bani-pal seems to have subdued by his lieutenants<sup>c</sup>, without any necessity of marching in person against them. Thebes was taken and retaken; but does not appear to have offered any resistance. Tarach<sup>o</sup>, upon his defeat at Memphis, fled to it, and again abandoned it as he had Memphis, and the army of Asshur-bani-pal made a massacre in it<sup>d</sup>. Once more it was taken, when it had been recovered by Urdamanie<sup>e</sup>, and then, if the inscriptions are rightly decyphered, strange as it is, the carrying off of men and women from it is mentioned in the midst of that of "great horses and apes." "Silver, gold, metals, stones, treasures of his palace, dyed garments, berom and linen, great horses, men male and female, immense apes—they drew from the midst of the city, and brought as spoils to Nineveh the city of my dominion, and kissed my feet."

All of those kings having been conquerors of Egypt, the captivity of No might equally have taken place under any of them. All of them employed the policy, which Sargon apparently began, of transporting to a distance those whom they had conquered<sup>f</sup>. Yet it is, in itself, more probable, that it was at the earlier than at the later date. It is most in harmony with the relation of Nahum to Isaiah that, in regard to the conquest of Thebes also, Nahum refers to the victory over Egypt and Ethiopia foretold by Isaiah, when Sargon's general, the Tartan, was besieging Ashdod. The object of Isaiah's prophecy was to undeceive Judah in regard to its reliance on Egypt and Ethiopia against Assyria, which was their continual bane, morally religiously nationally. But the prophecy goes beyond any mere defeat in battle, or capture of prisoners. It relates to conquest within Egypt itself. For Isaiah says, "the king of Assyria shall lead into captivity Egyptians and Ethiopians, young and old." They are not their choice young men<sup>g</sup>, the flower of their army, but those of advanced age and those in their first youth<sup>h</sup>, such as are taken captive, only when a population itself is taken captive, either in a marauding expedition, or in the capture of a city. The account of the captivity of No exactly corresponds with this. Nahum says nothing of its permanent subdual, only of the captivity of its inhabitants. But Esarhaddon apparently did not carry the Egyptians captive at all<sup>i</sup>. Every fact given in the inscriptions looks like a permanent settlement. The establishment of the 20 subordinate kings, in the whole length and breadth of Egypt, implies the continuance of the previous state of things, with the exception of that subordination.

In regard to the fulfilment of prophecy, they who assume as an axiom, or petitio principii, that there can be no prophecy of distant events, have overlooked, that while they think that, by assuming the later date, they bring Nahum's prophecy of the capture of Nineveh nearer to its accomplishment, they remove in the same degree Isaiah's prophecy of the captivity of Egyptians and Ethiopians, young and old, from its accomplishment. "Young and old" are not the prisoners of a field of battle; young and old of the Ethiopians would not be in a city of lower Egypt. If Isaiah's prophecy was not fulfilled under Sargon or Sennacherib, it must probably have waited for its fulfilment until this last subdual by Asshurbanipal. For the policy of Esarhaddon and also of Asshurbanipal, until repeated rebellions wore his patience, was of settlement, not of deportation. If too the prophecy of Nahum were brought down to the reign of Asshurbanipal, it would be the more stupendous. For the empire was more consolidated. Nahum tells the conqueror, flushed with his own successes and those of his father, that he had himself no more inherent power than the city whose people he had carried captive. Thebes too, like Nineveh, dwelt securely, conquering all, unreached by any ill, seagirt, as it were, by the mighty river on which she rested. She too was strengthened with countless hosts of her own and of allied people. Yet she fell. Nineveh, the prophet tells her, was no mightier, in herself. Her river was no stronger defence than that sea of fresh water, the Nile; her tributaries would disperse or become her enemies. The Prophet holds up to her the vicissitudes of No-amon, as a mirror to herself. As each death is a renewed witness to man's mortality, so each marvellous reverse of temporal greatness is a witness to the precariousness of other human might. No then was an ensample to Nineveh, although its capture was by the armies of Nineveh. They had been, for centuries, two rivals for power. But the contrast had far more force, when the victory over Egypt was fresh, than after 61 years of alternate conquest and rebellion.

But, any how, the state of Nineveh and its empire, as pictured by Nahum, is inconsistent with any times of supposed weakness in the reign of its last king: the state of Judah, with reference to Assyria, corresponds with that under Sennacherib but with none below. They are these. Assyria was in its full unimpaired strength<sup>m</sup>. She still blended those two characters so rarely combined, but actually united in her and subsequently in Babylon, of a great merchant and military people. She had, at once, the prosperity of peace and of war. Lying on a great line of ancient traffic, which bound together East and West, India with Phœnicia, and with Europe through Phœnicia, both East and West poured their treasures into the great capital, which lay as a centre between them, and stretched out its arms, alike to the Indian sea and the Mediterranean. Nahum can compare its merchants only to that which is countless by man, the locusts or the stars of heaven<sup>n</sup>. But amid this prosperity of peace, war also was enriching her. Nineveh was still sending out its messengers (such as was Rabshakeh), the leviers of its tribute, the demanders of submission. It was still one vast lion-lair, its lions still gathering in prey from the whole earth<sup>a</sup>, still desolating, continually, unceasingly, in all directions<sup>b</sup>, and now, specially, devising evil against God and His people<sup>c</sup>. Upon that people its yoke already pressed, for God promises to break it off from them<sup>d</sup>; the people was already afflicted, for God says to it, Though I have afflicted thee, I will afflict thee no more<sup>e</sup>, viz. by this invader. The solemn feasts of Judah were hindered through the presence of ungodly invaders; Bellal, the counsellor of evil spoken of under that name, already passing through her<sup>f</sup>. War was around her, for he promises that one should publish peace upon her mountains<sup>g</sup>. This was the foreground of the picture. This was the exact condition of things at Hezekiah's second invasion, just before the miraculous destruction of his army. Sennacherib's yoke was heavy; for he had exacted from Hezekiah three hundred talents of silver and thirty talents of gold<sup>h</sup>; Hezekiah had not two thousand horsemen; the great host<sup>i</sup> of the Assyrians encircled Jerusalem. They summoned it to surrender on the terms, that they should pay a new tribute, and that Sennacherib, whenever it pleased him, should remove them to Assyria<sup>j</sup>.

At no subsequent period were there any events corresponding to this description. Manasseh was carried captive to Babylon by Esarhaddon; but probably this was no formidable or resisted invasion, since the book of Kings passes it over altogether, the Chronicles mention only that the Assyrian generals took Manasseh prisoner in a thicket<sup>k</sup>, accordingly not in Jerusalem, and carried him to Babylon. Probably, this took place, in the expedition of Esarhaddon to the West, when he settled in the cities of Samaria people of different nations, his captives<sup>l</sup>. The capture of Manasseh was then, probably, a mere incident in the history. Since he was taken among the thickets, he had probably fled, as Zedekiah did afterwards, and was taken in his place of concealment. This was simply personal. No taking of towns is mentioned, no siege, no terror, no exaction of tribute, no carrying away into captivity, except of the single Manasseh. The grounds of his restoration are not mentioned. The Chronicles mention only the religious aspect of his captivity and his restoration, his sin and his repentance. But it seems probable that he was restored by Esarhaddon, upon the same system of policy, on which he planted subjects of his own in Samaria and the country around Zidon, built a new town to take the place of Zidon, and joined in the throne of Edom one, brought up in his own palace. For, when restored, Manasseh was set at full liberty to fortify Jerusalem<sup>m</sup>, as Hezekiah had done, and to put "captains of war in all the cities of Judah". This looks as if he was sent back as a trusted tributary of Esarhaddon, and as a frontier-power against Egypt. At least, sixty years afterwards, we find Josiah, in the like relation of trust to Nebuchadnezzar, resisting the passage of Pharaoh-Necho. However, the human cause of his restoration must remain uncertain. Yet clearly, in their whole history, there is nothing to correspond to the state of Judæa, as described by Nahum.

A recent critic writes, "Nahum's prophecy must have been occasioned by an expedition of mighty enemies against Nineveh.—The whole prophecy is grounded on the certain danger, that Nineveh is as good as fallen; and all which in this is purely prophetic is the way in which this visible peril is contemplated in connection with the eternal truths."

Ewald does not explain, how "Nineveh was as good as fallen," when it did not fall. The explanation must come to this. Nahum described a siege of Nineveh and its issue, as certain. The description in itself might be either of an actual siege, before the Prophet's eyes, or of one beheld in the Prophet's mind. But obviously no mere man, endowed with mere human knowledge, would have ventured to predict so certainly the fall of such a city as Nineveh, unless it was "as good as fallen." But according to the axiom received in Ewald's school, Nahum, equally with all other men, could have had only human prescience. Therefore Nahum, prophesying the issue so confidently, must have prophesied when Nineveh "was as good as fallen." The a priori axiom of the school rules its criticism. Meanwhile the admission is incidentally made, that a prophecy so certain, had it related to distant events, was what no man, with mere human knowledge, would venture upon. Ewald accordingly thinks that the prophecy was occasioned by a siege of Phraortes; which siege Nahum expected to be successful; which however failed, so that Nahum was mistaken, although the overthrow which he foretold came to pass afterwards! The siege, however, of Nineveh by Phraortes is a mere romance. Herodotus, who alone attributes to Phraortes a war with Assyria, has no hint, that he even approached to Nineveh. He simply relates that Phraortes "subdued Asia, going from one nation to another, until, leading an army against the Assyrians, he perished himself, in the 22nd year of his reign, and the greater part of his army." It is not necessary to consider the non-natural expositions, by which the simple descriptions of Nahum were distorted into conformity with this theory, which has no one fact to support it. Herodotus even dwells on the good condition of the Assyrian affairs, although isolated from their revolted allies, and seemingly represents the victory as an easy one. And, according to Herodotus, whose account is the only one we have, Phraortes (even if he ever fought with the Ninevites, and Herodotus' account is not merely the recasting of the history of another Median Frawartish who, according to the Behistun Inscription, claimed the throne of Media against Darius, and perished in battle with him<sup>n</sup>) had only an unorganised army. Herodotus says of Cyaxares, his son, "He is said to have been more warlike far than his forefathers, and he first distributed Asiatics into distinct bands, and separated the spearmen and archers and horsemen from one another, whereas, before, everything had alike mixed into one confused mass." Such an undisciplined horde could have been no formidable enemy for a nation, whom the monuments and their history exhibit as so warlike and so skilled in war as the Assyrians.

Another critic<sup>o</sup>, then, seeing the untenableness of this theory, ventures (as he never hesitated at any paradox) to place the prophet Nahum, as an eye-witness of the first siege of Cyaxares.

Herodotus states that Cyaxares, the son of Phraortes, twice besieged Nineveh. First, immediately after his father's death, to avenge it<sup>p</sup>; the second, after the end of the Scythian troubles, when he took it<sup>q</sup>. The capture of Nineveh was in the first year of Nabopolassar B. C. 625. The accession of Cyaxares, according to Herodotus, was B. C. 633. Eight years then only elapsed between his first siege and its capture, and, if it be true, that the siege lasted two years, there was an interval of six years only. But, at this time, the destruction of Nineveh was no longer a subject of joy to Judah. Since the captivity of Manasseh, Judah had had nothing to fear from Assyria; nor do we know of any oppression from it. Holy Scripture mentions none. The Assyrian monuments speak of expeditions against Egypt; but there was no temptation to harass Judah, which stood in the relation of a faithful tributary and an outwork against Egypt, and which, when Nineveh fell, remained in the same relation to its conquerors, into whose suzerainty it passed, together with the other dependencies of Assyria. The relation of Josiah to Babylon was the continuation of that of Manasseh to Esarhaddon.

The motive of this theory is explained by the words, "With a confidence, which leaves room for no doubt, Nahum expects a siege and an ultimate destruction of Nineveh. The security of his tone, nay that he ventures at all to hope so enormous a revolution of the existing state of things, must find its explanation in the circumstances of the time, out of the then condition of the world; but not till Cyaxares reigned in Media, did things assume an aspect, corresponding to this confidence." It is well that this writer doffs the courteous language, as to the "hopes," "expectations," "inferences from God's justice," and brings the question to the issue, "there is such absolute certainty of tone," that Nahum must have had either a Divine or a human knowledge. He acknowledges the untenableness of any theory which would account for the prophecy of Nahum on any human knowledge, before Cyaxares was marching against the gates of Nineveh. Would human knowledge have sufficed then? Certainly, from such accounts as we have, Nineveh might still have stood against Cyaxares and its own rebel and traitorous general, but for an unforeseen event which man could not bring about, the swelling of its river.

But, as usual, unbelief fixes itself upon that which is minute, ignores what is greatest. There are, in Nahum, three remarkable predictions. 1) The sudden destruction of Sennacherib's army and his own remarkable death in the house of his god. 2) The certain, inevitable, capture of Nineveh, and that, not by capitulation or famine, not even by the siege or assault, which is painted so vividly, but the river, which was its protection, becoming the cause of its destruction. 3) Its utter desolation, when captured. The first, men assume to have been the description of events past; the second, the siege, they assume to have been present; and that, when human wisdom could foresee its issue; the third, they generalise. The first is beyond the reach of proof now. It was a witness of the Providence and just judgement of God, to those days, not to our's. A brief survey of the history of Assyrian Empire will shew, that the second and third predictions were beyond human knowledge.

The Assyrian Empire dated probably from the ninth century before Christ. Such, it has been pointed out, is the concurrent result of the statements of Berosus and Herodotus. Moses, according to the simplest meaning of his words, spake of the foundation of Nineveh as contemporary with that of Babylon. 'The beginning of the kingdom of Nimrod, he relates, was Babel and Erech, and Accad and Calneh, in the land of Shinar. Out of that land went forth Asshur, and builded Nineveh. Oppressed probably and driven forth by Nimrod, Asshur and his Semitic descendants went forth from the plain of Shinar, the Babylonia of after-ages. Had Moses intended to express (what some have thought), that Nimrod "went forth out of that land to Assyria," he would doubtless have used the ordinary style of connected narrative; "And he went forth thence." He would probably also have avoided ambiguity, by expressing that Nimrod "went forth to Asshur," using a form, which he employs a little later. As it is, Moses has used a mode of speech, by which, in Hebrew, a parenthetic statement would be made, and he has not used the form, which occurs in every line of Hebrew narrative to express a continued history. No one indeed would have doubted that such was the meaning, but that they did not see, how the mention of Asshur, a son of Shem, came to be anticipated in this account of the children of Ham. This is no ground for abandoning the simple construction of the Hebrew. It is but the history, so often repeated in the changes of the world, that the kingdom of Nimrod was founded on the expulsion of the former inhabitants. Nimrod began his kingdom; "Asshur went forth."

It is most probable, from this same brief notice, that Nineveh was, from the first, that aggregate of cities, which it afterwards was. Moses says, "And he builded Nineveh and Rehoboth-Ir and Calach and Resen, between Nineveh and Calach; this is that great city." This cannot be understood as said exclusively of Nineveh; since Nineveh was mentioned first in the list of cities, and the mention of the three others had intervened; and, in the second place where it is named, it is only spoken of indirectly and subordinately; it is hardly likely to be said of Resen, of whose unusual size nothing is elsewhere related. It seems more probable, that it is said of the aggregate of cities, that they formed together one great city, the very characteristic of Nineveh, as spoken of in Jonah.

Nineveh itself lay on the Eastern side of the Tigris, opposite to the present Mosul. In later times, among the Syrian writers, Asshur becomes the name for the country, distinct from Mesopotamia and Babylonia, from which it was separated by the Tigris, and bounded on the North by Mount Niphates.

This distinction, however, does not occur until after the extinction of the Assyrian empire. On the contrary, in Genesis, Asshur, in one place, is spoken of as West<sup>p</sup> of the Hiddekel or Tigris, so that it must at that time have comprised Mesopotamia, if not all on this side of the Tigris, i. e. Babylonia. In another place, it is the great border-state of Arabia on the one side, as was Egypt on the other. The sons of Ishmael, Moses relates, dwelt from Havilah unto Shur that is before Egypt, as thou goest to Assyria; i. e. they dwelt on the great caravan-route across the Arabian desert from Egypt to Babylonia. Yet Moses mentions, not Babylon, but Asshur. In Balaam's prophecy<sup>r</sup>, Asshur stands for the great Empire, whose seat was at one time at Nineveh, at another at Babylon, which should, centuries afterwards, carry Israel captive.

Without entering into the intricacies of Assyrian or Babylonian history further than is necessary for the immediate object, it seems probable, that the one or other of the sovereigns of these nations had an ascendancy over the others, according to his personal character and military energy. Thus, in the time of Abraham, Chedorlaomer king of Elam, in his

xiv. 23.) The Philistines too were obviously facing Saul who was at Gilgal (1 Sam. xiii. 12). In Ezek. xxxix. 11, the words "eastward of the sea," express that the carcasses were outside the promised land. In Gen. iv. 16, Cain was not one to linger over-against the lost Eden. Probably he went Eastward, because then too the stream of population went Westward. In Isaiah vii. 20 the king of Assyria is spoken of as beyond the river, i. e. the Euphrates. <sup>1</sup> Gen. xxv. 18. <sup>2</sup> Num. xiv. 22.

expedition against the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, took with him, as subordinate allies, the kings of Shinar, (or Babylon) and Ellasar, as well as Tidal king of nations, a king probably of Nomadic tribes. The expedition was to avenge the rebellion of the petty kings in the valley of Siddim against Chedorlaomer, after they had been for twelve years tributary. But, although the expedition closed with the attack on the five kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar, its extent on the East side of the Jordan from Ashteroth Karnaim in Basan to Elparan (perhaps Elath on the Red Sea), and the defeat of the giant tribes, the Rephaim, Zuzim, Emim, Horites, the Amalekites and the Amorites in their several abodes, seems to imply one of those larger combinations against the aggressions of the East, which we meet with in later times*. It was no insulated conflict which spread over nearly three degrees of latitude. But it was the king of Elam, not the king of Babylon or of Asshur, who led this expedition; and those other kings, according to the analogy of the expeditions of Eastern monarchs, were probably dependent on him. It has been observed that the inscriptions of a monarch whose name partly coincides with that of Chedorlaomer, viz. Kudurmabuk, or Kudurmapula, shew traces of a Persian influence on the Chaldee characters; but cuneiform decyphers having desponded of identifying those monarchs†, Chedorlaomer appears as yet only so far connected with Babylon, that its king was a tributary sovereign to him or a vice-king" like those of later times, of whom Sennacherib boasts, "Are not my princes altogether kings?"

Assyria, at this time, is not mentioned, and so, since we know of its existence at an earlier period, it probably was independent. Lying far to the North of any of the nations here mentioned, it, from whatever cause or however it may have been engaged, took no share in the war. Subsequently also, down to a date almost contemporary with the Exodus, it has been observed that the name of Asshur does not appear on the Babylonian inscriptions, nor does it swell the titles of the king of Babylon‡. A little later than the Exodus, however, in the beginning of the 14th century B. C., Asshur and Egypt were already disputing the country which lay between them. The account is Egyptian, and so, of course, only relates the successes of Egypt. Thothmes III, in his fortieth year, according to Mr Birch, received tribute from a king of Nineveh§. In another monument of the same monarch, where the line, following on the name Nineveh, is lost, Thothmes says that he "erected his tablet in Naharaina (Mesopotamia) for the extension of the frontiers of Kami" [Egypt]. Amenophis III, in the same century, represented Asiatic captives¶, with the names of Patana [Padan-Aram], Asuria, Karukamishi [Carchemish]. "On another column are Saenkar (Shinar), Naharina, and the Khita (Hittites)." The mention of these contiguous nations strengthens the impression that the details of the interpretation are accurate. All these inscriptions imply that Assyria was independent of Babylon. In one, it is a co-ordinate power: in the two others, it is a state which had measured its strength with Egypt, under one of its greatest conquerors, though, according to the Egyptian account, it had been worsted.

Another account, which has been thought to be the first instance of the extension of Babylonian authority so far northward, seems to me rather to imply the ancient self-government of Assyria. "A record of Tiglathpileser I. declares him to have rebuilt a temple in the city of Asshur, which had been taken down 60 years previously, after it had lasted for 641 years from the date of its first foundation by Shamas-Iva, son of Ismi-Dagon." Sir H. Rawlinson thinks that it is probable (although only probable)¶, that this Ismi-Dagon is a king, whose name occurs in the brick-legends of Lower Babylonia. Yet the Ismi-Dagon of the bricks does not bear the title of king of Babylon, but of king of Niffer only‡: "his son," it is noticed, "does not take the title of king; but of governor of Hur." The name Shamas-Iva nowhere occurs in connection with Babylonia, but it does recur, at a later period, as the name of an Assyrian Monarch†. Since the names of the Eastern kings so often continue on in the same kingdom, the recurrence of that name, at a later period, makes it even probable, that Shamas-Iva was a native king. There is absolutely nothing to connect his father Ismi-Dagon with the Ismi-Dagon king of Niffer, beyond the name itself, which, being Semitic, may just as well have belonged to a native king of Nineveh as to a king of Lower Babylonia. Nay, there is nothing to shew that Ismi-Dagon was not an Assyrian Monarch who reigned at Niffer; for the name of his father is still unknown; there is no evidence that his father was ever a king, or, if a king, where he reigned. It seems to me in the last degree precarious to assume, without further evidence, the identity of the two kings. It has, further, yet to be shewn that Lower Babylonia had, at that time, an empire, as distinct from its own local sovereignty. We know from Holy Scripture of Nimrod's kingdom in Shinar, a province distinct from Elymais, Mesopotamia, Assyria, and probably Chaldæa. In Abraham's time, 1900 B. C., we find again a king of Shinar. Shinar again, it is supposed, appears in Egyptian inscriptions, in the 14th century, B. C.§; and, if so, still distinct from Mesopotamia and Assyria. But all this implies a distinct kingdom, not an empire.

Again, were it ever so true, that Shamas-Iva was a son of a king in Lower Babylonia, that he built a temple in Kileh-Shergat, as being its king, and that he was king, as placed there by Ismi-Dagon, this would be no proof of the continual dependence of Assyria upon Babylonia. England did not continue a dependency of France, because conquered by William of Normandy. How was Alexander's empire broken at once! Spain under Charles the V. was under one sovereignty with Austria; Spain with France had, even of late, alike Bourbon kings. A name would, at most, shew an accidental, not a permanent, connection.

But there is, at present, no evidence implying a continued dependence of Assyria upon Babylon. Two facts only have been alleged; 1) that the cuneiform writing of inscriptions at Kileh-Shergat, 40 miles South of Nineveh, has a Babylonian character; 2) that, on those bricks, four names have been found of inferior Satraps.

But 1) the Babylonian character of the inscriptions would show a dependence of civilisation, not of empire. Arts flourished early at Babylon, and so the graven character of the Inscriptions too may have been carried to the rougher and warlike North. The garment, worked at Babylon, was, in the 15th century B. C., exported as far as Palestine, and was, for its beauty, the object of Achan's covetousness<sup>1</sup>.

2) In regard to the satraps whose names are found on the bricks of Kileh-Shergat, it does not appear, that they were tributary to Babylon at all; they may, as far as it appears, have been simply inferior officers of the Assyrian empire. Any how, the utmost which such a relation to Babylon would evince, if ever so well established, would be a temporary dependence of Kileh-Shergat itself, not of Nineveh or the Assyrian kingdom. Further, the evidence of the duration of the dependency would be as limited at its extent. Four satraps would be no evidence as to this period of 700 years, only a century less than has elapsed since the Norman conquest. The early existence of an Assyrian kingdom has been confirmed by recent cuneiform discoveries, which give the names of 8 Assyrian kings, the earliest of whom is supposed to have reigned about 3½ centuries before the commencement of the Assyrian Empire<sup>1</sup>.

The "empire," Herodotus says<sup>2</sup>, "Assyria held in Upper Asia for 520 years;" Berosus<sup>3</sup>, "for 526 years." The Cuneiform Inscriptions give much the same result. Tiglath-pileser<sup>4</sup>, who gives five years' annals of his own victories, mentions his grandfather's grandfather, the 4th king before him, as the king who "first organised the country of Assyria," who "established the troops of Assyria in authority." The expression, "established in authority," if it may be pressed, relates to foreign conquest. If this Tiglathpileser be the same whom Sennacherib, in the 10th year of his own reign, mentions as having lost his gods to Merodach-ad-akhi, king of Mesopotamia, 418 years before<sup>5</sup>, then, since Sennacherib ascended the throne about 703 B.C.<sup>6</sup>, we should have B.C. 1112 for the latter part of the reign of Tiglath-pileser I., and counting this and the six preceeding reigns at 20 years each<sup>7</sup>, should have about 1252 B.C. for the beginning of the Assyrian empire. It has been calculated that if the 526 years, assigned by Berosus to his 45 Assyrian kings, are (as Polyhistor<sup>8</sup> states Berosus to have meant) to be dated back from the accession of Pul who took tribute from Menahem, and so from between B.C. 770 and B.C. 760, they carry back the beginning of the dynasty to about 1290 B.C. If they be counted, (as is perhaps more probable) from the end of the reign of Pul<sup>9</sup>, i. e. probably B.C. 747, "the era of Nabonassar," the Empire would commence about 1273 B.C. Herodotus, it has been shewn<sup>10</sup>, had much the same date in his mind, when he assigned 520 years to the Assyrian empire in upper Asia, dating back from the revolt of the Medes. For he supposed this revolt to be 179 years anterior to the death of Cyrus B.C. 529 (and so, B.C. 708) + a period of anarchy before the accession of Deioces. Allowing 30 years for this period of anarchy, we have 738 B.C. + 520, i. e. 1258 B.C., for the date of the commencement of Assyrian empire according to Herodotus. Thus, the three testimonies would coincide in placing the beginning of that Empire any how between 1258 and 1273 B.C.

But this Empire started up full-grown. It was the concentration of energy and power, which had before existed.

Herodotus' expression is "rulers of Upper Asia." Tiglath-pileser attributes to his forefather, that he "organised the country," and "established the armies of Assyria in authority." The 2nd king of that list takes the title of "ruler over the people of Bel," i. e. Babylonia. The 4th boasts to have reduced "all the lands of the Magian world." Tiglath-pileser I. claims to have conquered large parts of Cappadocia, Syria from Tsukha to Carchemish, Media and Muzr. According to the inscription at Bavian<sup>11</sup>, he sustained a reverse, and lost his gods to a king of Mesopotamia, which gods were recovered by Sennacherib from Babylon. Yet this exception the more proves that conquest was the rule. For, had there been subsequent successful invasions of Assyria by Babylonia, the spoils of the 5th century backward would not have been alone recovered or recorded. If the decyphering of the Inscriptions is to be trusted, Nineveh was the capital, even in the days of Tiglath-pileser I. For Sennacherib brought the gods back, it is said, and put them in their places, i. e. probably where he himself reigned, at Nineveh. Thence then they were taken in the reign of Tiglath-pileser. Nineveh then was his capital also.

Of an earlier portion we have as yet but incidental notices; yet the might of Assyria is attested by the presence of Assyrian names in the Egyptian dynastic lists, whether the dynasties were themselves Assyrian, or whether the names came in through matrimonial alliances between two great nations<sup>12</sup>.

With few exceptions, as far as appears from their own annals (and these are in the later times confirmed by Holy Scripture), the Assyrian Empire was, almost whenever we hear of it, one long series of victory and rapine. It is an exception, if any monarch is peaceful, and content to "repair the buildings" in his residence, "leaving no evidence of conquest or greatness." Tiglath-Nin, father of the warlike Asshur-i-danipal or Sardanapalus, is mentioned only in his son's monument, "among his warlike ancestors, who had carried their arms into the Armenian mountains, and there set up stelæ to commemorate their conquests." Civil wars there were, and revolutions. Conquerors and dynasties came to an untimely end; there was parricide, fratricide; but the tide of war and conquest rolled on. The restless warriors gave no rest. Sardanapalus terms himself, "the conqueror from the upper passage of the Tigris to Lebanon and the great sea, who all countries, from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof, has reduced under his authority." His son, Shalmanubar or Shalmaneser, in his thirty-five years of reign led, in person twenty-three military expeditions. 20,000, 16,000, are the numbers of his enemies left dead upon a field of battle with Benhadad and Hazael<sup>13</sup>. Cappadocia, Pontus, Armenia, Media, Babylonia, Syria, Phœnicia<sup>14</sup>, 15 degrees of longitude and 10 of latitude, save where the desert or the sea gave him nothing to conquer, were the range of his repeated expeditions. He circled round Judæa. He thrice defeated Benhadad with his allies (on several occasions, twelve kings of the Hittites). His own army exceeded on occasions 100,000 fighting men. Twice he defeated Hazael. Israel under Jehu, Tyre, Sidon, 24 kings in Pontus, kings of the Hittites, of Chaldæa, 27 kings of Persia are among his tributaries<sup>4</sup>; "the shooting of his arrows struck terror," he says, "as far as the sea" [Indian Ocean]; "he put up his arrows in their quiver at the sea of the setting sun." His son Shamasiva apparently subdued Babylonia, and in the West conquered tribes near Mount Taurus, on the North the countries bordering on Armenia to the South and East, the Medes beyond Mount Zagros, and "the Zimri" in upper Luristan.<sup>5</sup> His son Ivalush III. or IV. received undisturbed tribute from the kingdoms which his fathers conquered, and ascribes to his god Asshur the grant of "the kingdom of Babylon to his son." Thus "Assyria with one hand grasped Babylonia; with the other Philistia and Edom; she held Media Proper, S. Armenia, possessed all Upper Syria, including Commagene and Amanus, bore sway over all the whole Syrian coast from Issus to Gaza, and from the coast to the desert." Tiglath-pileser II. and Shalmaneser are known to us as conquerors from Holy Scripture<sup>6</sup>. Tiglath-pileser, we are told from the inscriptions, warred and conquered in Upper Mesopotamia, Armenia, Media, Babylonia, drove into exile a Babylonian prince, destroyed Damascus, took tribute from a Hiram king of Tyre, and from a Queen of the Arabs<sup>7</sup>. And so it continued, until nearly the close of the Monarchy.

The new dynasty which began with Sargon were even greater conquerors than their predecessors. Sargon, in a reign of seventeen or nineteen years, defeated the king of Elam, conquered in Iatbour beyond Elam, reigned from Ras, a dependency on Elam, over Poukoud (Pekod), Phœnicia, Syria, &c. to the river of Egypt, in the far Media to the rising sun, in Scythia, Albania, Parthia, Van, Armenia, Colchis, Tubal to the Moschi: he placed his lieutenants as governors over these countries, and imposed tribute upon them, as upon Assyrians; he, probably, placed Merodach-Baladan on the throne of Babylon, and after 12 years displaced him; he reduced all Chaldæa under his rule; he defeated "Sebech (i. e., probably, So), Sultan of Egypt, so that he was heard of no more;" he received tribute from the Pharaoh of Egypt, from a Queen of Arabia and from Himyar the Sabæan. To him first the king of Meroe paid tribute. He finally captured Samaria: he took Gaza, Kharkar, Arpad and Damascus, Ashdod (which it cost Psammetichus 29 years to reconquer), and Tyre, (which resisted Nebuchadnezzar for 13 years). He added to the Satrapy of Parthia, placed a Satrap or Lieutenant over Commagene and Samaria, Kharkar, Tel-Garimmi, Gamgoum, Ashdod, and a king of his own choice over Albania. He seized 55 walled cities in Armenia, 11, which were held to be "inaccessible fortresses;" and 62 great cities in Commagene; 34 in Media; he laid tribute on the "king of the country of rivers." He removed whole populations at his will; from Samaria, he carried captive its inhabitants, 27,800, and placed them in "cities of the Medes;" he removed those of Commagene to Elam; all the great men of the Tibareni, and the inhabitants of unknown cities, to Assyria; Cammanians, whom he had conquered, to Tel-Garimmi, a capital which he rebuilt; others whom he had vanquished in the East he placed in Ashdod: again he placed "Assyrians devoted to his empire" among the Tibareni; inhabitants of cities unknown to us, in Damascus; Chaldæans in Commagene<sup>8</sup>. "The Comukha were removed from the extreme North to Susiana, and Chaldæans were brought from the extreme South to supply their place." "Seven kings of Iatnan, seven days' voyage off in the Western seas, whose names were unknown to the kings" his "fathers, hearing of" his "deeds, came before" him to Babylon with "presents;" as did the king of Asmoun, who dwelt in the midst of the Eastern sea (the Persian gulf). He placed his statue, "writing on it the glory of Asshur his master," in the capital of Van, in Kikisim (Circesium) as also in Cyprus, which he does not name, but where it has been discovered in this century<sup>9</sup>. The Moschian king, with his 3000 towns, who had never submitted to the kings his predecessors, sent his submission and tribute to him.

Sennacherib, the son of Sargon, says of himself, "Assour, the great lord, has conferred on me sovereignty over the peoples; he has extended my dominion over all those who dwell in the world. From the upper Ocean of the setting sun to the lower Ocean of the rising sun, I reduced under my power all who carried aloft their head." He defeated Merodach-Baladan and the king of Elam together<sup>10</sup>; took in one expedition, "79 great strong cities of the Chaldæans and 820 small towns;" he took prisoners by hundreds of thousands; 200,150 in his first expedition against Hezekiah, from 44 great walled cities which he took and little villages innumerable<sup>11</sup>; 208,000 from the Nabathæans and Hagarenes<sup>12</sup>: he employed on his great buildings 360,000 men, gathered from Chaldæa and Aramæa, from Cilicia and Armenia<sup>13</sup>; he conquered populations in the North, which "had of old not submitted to the kings my brothers;" annexed them to the prefecture of Arrapachitis and set up his image<sup>14</sup>; he received tribute from the governor of Khararat<sup>15</sup>, wasted the 2 residence-cities, 34 smaller cities of Ispahara king of Albania, joining a part of the territory to Assyria, and calling its city, Ilhinzas, the city of Sennacherib<sup>16</sup>; he reduced countries of "Media, whose names the kings his brothers had not heard;" he set a king, Toubaal, over the great and little Sidon, Sarepta, Achzib, Acco, Betzitti, Mahalliba; the kings of Moab, Edom, Bet-Amman, Avvad, Ashdod, submitted to him<sup>17</sup>; he defeated an "innumerable host" of Egyptians at Altakou<sup>18</sup> [Elteke]; sons of the king of Egypt fell into his hands; he captured Ascalon, Bene-Barak, Joppa, Hazor<sup>19</sup>; put back at Amgarron [Migron] the expelled king Padi, who had been surrendered to Hezekiah<sup>20</sup>; gave portions of the territory of Hezekiah to the kings of Ashdod, Migron, Gaza<sup>21</sup>; he drove Merodach-baladan again to Elam, captured his brothers, wasted his cities, and placed his own eldest son, Assur-nadin, on the throne of Babylon<sup>22</sup>; took seven impregnable cities of the Toutharri, placed like birds' nests on the mountains of Nipour<sup>23</sup>; conquered the king of Oukkou in Dayi, among mountains which none of his ancestors had penetrated; took Oukkou and 33 other cities<sup>24</sup>; attacked Elam, "crossing" the Persian gulf "in Syrian vessels;" capturing the men, and destroying the cities<sup>25</sup>; in another campaign, he garrisoned, with prisoner-warriors of his own, cities in Elam which his father had lost<sup>26</sup>; destroyed 34 large cities and others innumerable of Elam<sup>27</sup>. His account of his reign closes with a great defeat of Elam, whom the escaped Souzenab had hired with the treasures of the temples of Babylon, and of 17 rebel tribes or cities, at Khalouli, and their entire subdual<sup>28</sup>. He repelled some Greeks in Cilicia, set up his image there, with a record of his deeds, and built Tarsus, on the model of Babylon<sup>o</sup>. It has been noticed, what a "keen appreciation of the merits of a locality" his selection of its site evinced. The destruction of his army of 185,000 men, at the word of God, might well deter him from again challenging the Almighty; but we have seen, in the wars of Napoleon I., that such losses do not break the power of an empire. It was no vain boast of Sennacherib, that he had gathered all the earth, and carried captive the gods of the nations. The boast was true; the application alone was impious. God owned in him the instrument which He had formed, the rod of His anger. He condemned him, only because the axe boasted itself against Him Who hewed therewith. Victorious, except when he fought against God, and employed by God to tread down the people as the mire of the streets<sup>t</sup>, Sennacherib was cut off as God foretold, but left his kingdom to a victorious son.

His son, Esarhaddon, takes titles, yet more lofty than those of Sennacherib. He calls himself, "h King of Assyria, Vicar of Babylon, King of the Sumirs and Accads, King of Egypt Meroe and Cush, who reigned from sunrising to sun-set, unequalled in the imposition of tributes." In Armenia, he killed Adrammelech<sup>i</sup>, his half-brother, one of his father's murderers, who fled to Armenia, probably to dispute thence his father's crown. In every direction he carried his conquests further than his powerful father<sup>k</sup>. He speaks of conquests in the far Media, "where none of the kings, our fathers," had conquered, whose kings bore well-known Persian names<sup>m</sup>.

They and their subjects were carried off to Assyria. Others, who "had not conspired against the kings my fathers and the land of Assyria, and whose territories my fathers had not conquered," submitted voluntarily in terror, paid tribute and received Assyrian governors. In the West, he pursued by sea a king of Sidon who rebelled, divided the Syrians in strange countries, and placed mountaineers, whom his bow had subdued in the East, with a governor, in a castle of Esarhaddon which he built in Syria. He warred successfully in Cilicia, Khoubousna, and destroyed 10 large cities of the Tibareni and carried their people captive; trod down the country of Masnaki, transported rebels of Van; he established on the Southern shore that son of Merodach-baladan who submitted to him, removing the brother who trusted in Elam, himself reigned in Babylon<sup>o</sup>, whither he carried Manassch<sup>n</sup>. He reconquered "the city of Adoumou (Edom), (the city of the power of the Arabs,) which Sennacherib had conquered, and carried off its people to Assyria;" he named as Queen of the Arabs, Tabouya, born in his palace; put the son of Hazael on his father's throne. An expedition to "a far country to the bounds of the earth beyond the desert," Bazi (Buz), reached by traversing 140 farsakhs (?) of sandy desert, then 20 farsakhs (?) of fertile land and a stony region, Khazi (Uz), looks like an expedition across Arabia, and, if so, was unparalleled except by Nushirvan. Some of the other names are Arabic. Any how, it was a country, whither none of his predecessors had gone; he killed 8 kings, carried off their subjects and spoils. He conquered the Gomboulou in their marshes. Twelve kings on the coast of Syria whom he recounts by name, (Ba'lou king of Tyre, Manasseh king of Judah, and those of Edom, Maan, Gaza, Ascalon, Amgarron, Byblos, Aradus, Ousimouroun, Bet-Ammon, Ashdod) and 10 kings of Yatnan in the sea (Cyprus),—Egiathus (Ikistousi), King of Idalion (Idial), Pythagoras (Pitagoura) K. of Citium (Kitthim), Ki—, K. of Salamis (Silhimimi), Ittodagon ("Dagon is with him," Itoudagon), K. of Paphos (Pappa), Euryalus (Irieli), K. of Soli (Sillou), Damasou, K. of Curium (Kuri), Ounagousou, K. of Limenion (Limini), Roumizu, K. of Tamassus (Tamizzi), Damutsi of Amti-Khadasti, Puhali of Aphrodisium (Oupridissa)<sup>r</sup>,—held their rule from him.

The names of the countries, from which he brought those whom he settled in Samaria, attest alike his strength and the then weakness of two of the nations, which afterwards concurred to overthrow his empire. The colonists, according to their own letters to Artaxerxes<sup>s</sup>, comprehended, among others, Babylonians; Archevites i. e. inhabitants of Erech, mentioned in Genesis<sup>t</sup>, as, together with Babel, part of the beginning of the kingdom of Nimrod; Susanchites, i. e. inhabitants of Susiana or Chusistan; Dehavites, Daans in Herodotus<sup>u</sup>, one of the wandering Persian tribes, whose name (Taia) still exists<sup>v</sup>; Elamites<sup>w</sup>, or the dwellers on the Persian gulf, bordering on Susiana; Apharsites or the Persians in their original abode in Paraca, Paraiç, now Farsistan. It seems also probable that the Apharsachites<sup>x</sup> are those more known to us as Sacæ or Scythians, whom Esarhaddon says that he conquered<sup>y</sup>; and that the Apharsachthites (with the same word Aphar prefixed) are the Sittaceni on the Caspian. The Dinaites and the Tarphelites are as yet unidentified, unless the Tarpetes<sup>z</sup> of the Palus Mæotis near the Sittaceni, or the Tapiri<sup>aa</sup> in Media be a corruption of the name. The Samaritan settlers add, And the rest of the nations, whom the great and noble Assnapper carried captive, and settled in the cities of Samaria and the rest on this side the river. Under this general term, they include the Mesopotamian settlers brought from Avvah and Sepharvaim, and those from Hamath<sup>ab</sup>, probably wishing to insist to the Persian Monarch on their Persian, Median, or Babylonian descent. They attest at the same time that their forefathers were not willingly removed but transported, carried into exile<sup>c</sup>, and accordingly that Esarhaddon, in whose reign they were removed, had power in all these countries. The condensation also of settlers from twelve nations in so small a space as the cities of Samaria (analogous as it is to the dispersion of the Jews over so many provinces of their captors) illustrates the policy of these transportations, and the strength which they gave to the empire. Nations were blended together among those foreign to them, with no common bond except their relation to their conqueror. A check on those around them, and themselves held in check by them, they had no common home to which to return, no interest to serve by rebelling. Esarhaddon built 36 temples in Assyria by the labour of foreign slaves, his captives, who worshipped his gods<sup>d</sup>.

This collection of people of twelve nations in the cities of Samaria represents moreover one portion only of the conquests of Esarhaddon, and, for the most part, that furthest from Judæa. For the principle of the policy was to remove them far from their own land. Ethiopian and Egyptian captives would be placed, not here whence they could easily return, but, like Israel in the cities of the Medes, whence they could find no escape.

The son of Esarhaddon, Asshurbanipal<sup>ee</sup> II., yet further enlarged and consolidated the conquests of his conquering father. His expeditions into Egypt have been already dwelt upon; his victories were easy, complete. Tirhaka, himself a great conqueror, fled into unknown deserts beyond reach of pursuers. His step-son Urdaminie attempted to recover his kingdom, was defeated at once, fled and his capital was taken. In Asia, he took away the king of Tyre, who offended him; made conquests beyond Mt. Taurus, where his fathers had never been<sup>b</sup>; received an embassy from Gyges; attached to Assyria a tract of Minni or Persarmenia, took the capital of Minni; took Shushan<sup>c</sup> and Badaca, slew their kings, united Susiana to Babylonia; subdued anew Edom, Moab, Kedar, the Nabathæans; received the submission of the king of Urarda, Ararat<sup>d</sup>. While Assyria was extended wider than before, its old enemies were more incorporated with it, or, at least, more subdued; it was more at one within itself. Egypt, the great rival Empire, had tried to shake off the yoke, but was subdued; no people in Syria or the valley of the Euphrates stirred itself; the whole tract within the Taurus, once so rife with enemies, lay hushed under his rule: hushed were the Hittites, Hamathites, the Syrians of Damascus, the Tibareni who had once held their own against his father; war was only at the very extremities, in Minni or Edom, and that, rather chastisement than war; Babylon was a tranquil portion of his empire, except during the temporary rebellion of the brother, whom he had placed over it, and whom he pardoned. His death, amid the tranquil promotion of literature<sup>e</sup>, when he had no more enemies to conquer or rebels to chasten, left his empire at the zenith of its power, some 22 years before its destruction. Calno had become, as Sennacherib boasted<sup>f</sup>, like Carchemish; Hamath like Arpad; Samaria as Damascus. He<sup>g</sup> had removed the bounds of the people and gathered all the earth, as one gathereth eggs, left by the parent bird, undefended even by its impotent love. There was not a cloud on the horizon, not a token whence the whirlwind would come. The bas-reliefs attest, that neither the energy nor the cruelty of the Assyrians were diminished<sup>h</sup>.

Of those twenty two years, we have nothing reliable except their close. There was probably nothing to relate. There would not be any thing, if Assurbanipal had consolidated his empire, as he seems to have done, and if his son and successor inherited his father's later tastes, and was free from the thirst of boundless conquest, which had characterised the earlier rulers of Assyria. Any how, we know nothing authentic. The invasion of Assyria by Phraortes, which Herodotus relates, is held, on good grounds, to be a later history of a rebellion against Darius Hystaspes, adapted to times before the Medes became one nation<sup>i</sup>. There was no reason why it should not have been recorded, had it taken place, since it is admitted to have been a total defeat, in which Phraortes lost his life<sup>j</sup>. The invasion of the Scythians, which is to have stopped the siege of Nineveh under Cyaxares, was reported in a manifestly exaggerated form to Herodotus. The 28 years, during which Herodotus relates the Scythian rule to have lasted<sup>k</sup>, is longer than the whole of the reign of the last king of Assyria; and yet, according to Herodotus, is to have been interposed between the two sieges of Cyaxares. And as its empire gave no sign of decay, so far as we can trace its history within 22 years before its destruction, so, with the like rapidity, did the empire rise, which was to destroy it. The account which Herodotus received, that the Medians had thrown off the yoke of Assyria before Deioces<sup>l</sup>, is in direct contradiction to the Assyrian inscriptions. This was, they state, the time, not of the revolt, but of the conquest of Media. They are confirmed by Holy Scripture, which says that the Assyrian king [Sargon] placed in the cities of the Medes<sup>m</sup> his Israelitish captives. The utmost, which Herodotus ascribes to Deioces however, is, that he consolidated the six Median tribes and built a capital, Agbatana<sup>n</sup>. It is an union of wild hordes into one people, held together for the time by the will of one man and by their weariness of mutual oppressions. Even according to their accounts, Cyaxares (about B.C. 633, i. e. 8 years before the fall of Nineveh) first organised the Median army; the Greeks, in the time of Æschylus, believed Cyaxares to have been the first of the Median kings<sup>o</sup>; rebels in Media and Sagartia claimed the Median throne against Darius, as descended from Cyaxares, as the founder of the Monarchy<sup>p</sup>.

Further, the subsequent history supports the account of Abydenus against Herodotus, that not the Medes, but the rebel general of the last Monarch of Nineveh was, with his Babylonian troops, the chief author of the destruction of Nineveh. The chief share of the spoil, where no motives of refined policy intervene, falls to the strongest, who had chief portion in the victory. "The Medes," says Herodotus, "took Nineveh, and conquered all Assyria, except the Babylonian portion<sup>q</sup>." But Babylon was no spared province, escaping with its independence as a gain. Babylonia, not Media, succeeded to the Southern and Western dominions of the Assyrian empire, and the place, where Nineveh had stood, Cyaxares retaining the North. This was a friendly arrangement, since subsequently too we find a Babylonian prince in the expedition of Cyaxares against Asia Minor, and Medians assisting Nebuchadnezzar against the king of Egypt<sup>r</sup>. Abydenus represents the Babylonians and Medes, as equal<sup>s</sup>, but exhibits the rebel general, as the author of the attack. "After him [Sardanapal], Sarac held the empire of Assyria, who, being informed of a horde of mingled troops which were coming against him from the sea, sent Busalossor [Nebopalassar] general of his army, to Babylon. But he, having determined to revolt, betrothed to his son, Nebuchodrossor, Amuhca, daughter of Asdahag, prince of the Medes, and soon made a rapid attack on Nineveh. King Sarac, when he knew the whole, set the palace Evorita on fire. Then Nebuchodrossor, attaining to the empire, encircled Babylon with strong walls."

The "horde of mingled troops" "from the sea" were probably those same Susians and Elymeans, whom the Assyrians had, in successive reigns, defeated. If the account of Herodotus were true, the father of the Median Monarch had perished in conflict with Assyria. The grandfather of the Assyrian Monarch had himself reigned in Babylon. Assyria ruled Babylon by viceroys to the end. It has been noticed that Nahum mentions no one enemy who should destroy Nineveh. True, for no one enemy did destroy her.

Even now its fall is unexplained. The conquests of its Monarchs had not been the victories of talented individuals. They were a race of world-wide conquerors. In the whole history, of which we have the annals, they are always on the aggressive. They exacted tribute where they willed. The tide of time bore them on in their conquests. Their latest conquests were the most distant. Egypt, her early rival, had been subdued by her. The powers, which did destroy her, had no common bond of interest. They were united, for one reign, not by natural interests, but, as far as we see, by the ambition of two individuals. These crushed, at once and for ever, the empire which for so many centuries had been the ravager of the world. But who could have foreseen such a combination and such results, save God, in Whose hands are human wills and the fate of empires?

The fiery empire of conquerors sank like a tropic sun. Its wrath had burned, unassuaged, "from" (in their own words) "the rising to the setting sun." No gathering cloud had tempered its heat or allayed its violence. Just ere it set, in those last hours of its course, it seemed, as if in its meridian. Its bloodstained disk cast its last glowing rays on that field of carnage in Susiana; then, without a twilight, it sank beneath those stormy waves, so strangely raised, at once and for ever. All, at once, was night. It knew no morrow.

Its fall is inexplicable still. It may have accelerated its own destruction by concentrating the fierce Chaldees at Babylon. It was weakened by the revolt of its own general, and with him the defection of an army. Still, in those days, the city of 1200 towers, each 200 feet high, its ordinary wall 100 feet high and of such breadth, that three chariots could drive on it abreast<sup>a</sup>, could not be taken by mounds, except by some most gigantic army with patience inexhaustible. Famine could not reduce a city, which, in its 60 miles in circumference, enclosed, like Babylon, space for much cattle, and which could, within its walls, grow corn enough for its population of 600,000. With its perennial supply of provision, it might have laughed to scorn a more formidable foe than the Medes, Elamites and Babylonians, unaccustomed to sieges, except in as far as any had fought in its armies, while the Ninevites possessed the hereditary skill of centuries. Babylon, smaller than Nineveh<sup>c</sup>, was at rest amidst the siege of the more powerful grandson of Cyaxares. Cyrus could only take it by stratagem; Darius Hystaspes, by treachery. Then, every Ninevite was a warrior. Their descendants, the Kurds, are still among the fiercest and most warlike people of Asia. The bas-reliefs, which bear internal evidence of truth, exhibit a wonderful blending of indomitable strength of will, recklessness of suffering, inherent physical energy, unimpaired by self-indulgence. A German writer on art says<sup>e</sup>, "You recognise a strong thickset race, of very powerful frame, yet inclined to corpulence, a very peculiar blending of energy and luxury.—The general impression of the figures, whether men, women or eunuchs, has uniformly something earnest and imposing." An English writer says still more vividly; "All the figures indicate great physical development, animal propensities very strongly marked, a calm, settled ferocity, a perfect nonchalance amidst the most terrible scenes; no change of feature takes place, whether the individual is inflicting or experiencing horrid sufferings.—The pictures are very remarkable as indicating the entire absence of higher mental and moral qualities: and the exuberance of brutal parts of man's nature. At the same time there is not wanting a certain consciousness of dignity and of inherent power. There is a tranquil energy and fixed determination, which will not allow the beholder to feel any contempt of those stern warriors."

How then could it fall? The prophecy of Nahum describes, with terrible vividness, a siege; the rousing of its king from a torpor of indolence; he remembereth his nobles; the orderly advance, the confused preparations for defence; and then, when expectation is strung, and we see besiegers and besieged prepared for the last decisive strife, there is a sudden pause. No human strength overthrows the city. The gates of the rivers shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved. And it is decreed, she shall be led away captive. Her captivity follows on the opening of the gates of the rivers. The rivers, ordinarily her strength, were also her weakness. The annals of Sennacherib relate, how he repaired a palace which had been undermined by the Tigris. "The small palace, which was become very ruinous in every part, because the river Tigris, during 16 years, had undermined and ravaged it, [I repaired.]" Dionysius, the Jacobite Patriarch, relates how in his own time, A.D. 763, "the Tigris, overflowing, laid waste all the towns around it, and especially Mosul" (opposite to Nineveh). Barhebræus, in four different years, mentions the destruction of houses in Bagdad through the overflow of the Tigris<sup>f</sup>. He mentions also a city-wall, overthrown by an inundation, so that 3000 men were drowned in their houses<sup>g</sup>. Ives relates<sup>h</sup>; "The Bishop (of Babylon) remembers that" about 1733 "the Euphrates and Tigris were so overflowed, that the whole country between them appeared as one large sea. Over all the plain between Bagdad and Hilla, people could pass only in boats. The water flowed quite up to the glacis, the ditch was full, the city also overflowed, and the foundation of most of the buildings hurt; 300 houses were entirely destroyed. To prevent as much as possible" the recurrence of such a calamity, "the Turks now face the foundation-wall of their houses with a composition of charcoal, ashes, and Demar (bitumen)." "The river Khosar," also, which would be swollen by the same causes as the Tigris, "entered the city," says Ainsworth<sup>i</sup>, "by an aperture in the walls on the East side, which appears to have formed part of the original plan and to have been protected by a gateway and walls, vestiges of which still remain." "The Khausser," says Mr. Rich<sup>j</sup>, "is generally drawn off for irrigating the cotton-plantations in the alluvial ground of the river; when it is much overflowed, it discharges itself into the Tigris above the bridge." "The Khausser now [Dec. 1. after "very heavy tropical rain,"] discharges itself direct into the Tigris, and brings an immense body of water." "After rain, it becomes an impetuous torrent, overflowing its banks and carrying all before it." "The stone-bridge was carried away one night by the violence of the Khausser, on a sudden inundation." On a lesser swelling of the river,—"the water-wheels were removed" in precaution "and the bridge of boats opened." Cazwini, the Arabic geographer, speaks of "the rivers of Nineveh."

Ctesias, being a writer of suspected authority, cannot safely be alleged in proof of the fulfilment of prophecy. Yet in this case his account, as it is in exact conformity with the obvious meaning of the prophecy of Nahum, so it solves a real difficulty, how Nineveh, so defended, could have fallen. It seems certain that the account of the siege taken from him by Di-odoros, is that of the last siege. It has been remarked<sup>k</sup> that the only event of the siege, known from any other source, viz. that the last Assyrian king, when he had learned the combination of the Medes and Babylonians against him, set fire to his palace, is related also by Ctesias. Ctesias has also the same fact, that the Babylonian revolt was recent; the name of the revolted general in Ctesias, Belisis, is the latter half of that given to him by Abydenus<sup>l</sup>, Nebopalassar, omitting only the name of the god, Nebo. The rest of the history is in itself probable. The success of the Assyrian monarch at first against the combined armies, and the consequent revelry, are that same blending of fierceness and sensuality which is stamped on all the Assyrian sculptures, continued to the end. The rest of his relation, which, on account of the facts of nature, which we know, but which, since they are gathered from sources so various, Ctesias probably did not know, is, in itself, probable, accounts for what is unaccounted for, and corresponds with the words of Nahum. It is, "Sardanapalus, seeing the whole kingdom in the greatest danger, sent his three sons and two daughters with much wealth to Paphlagonia to Cotta the Governor, being the best-disposed of his subjects. He himself sent by messengers to all his subjects for forces, and prepared what was needed for the siege. He had an oracle handed down from his forefathers, that no one should take Nineveh, unless the river first became an enemy to the city. Conceiving that this never would be, he held to his hopes, purposing to abide the siege and awaited the armies to be sent by his subjects." "The rebels, elated by their successes, set themselves to the siege, but on account of the strength of the walls, could in no wise injure those in the city." "But these had great abundance of all necessities through the foresight of the king. The siege then being prolonged for two years, they pressed upon it; assaulting the walls and cutting off those therein from any exit into the country." "In the 3rd year, the river, swollen by continuous and violent rains, inundated a part of the city and overthrew 20 stadia of the wall. Then the king, thinking that the oracle was fulfilled, and that the river was plainly an enemy to the city, despaired of safety. And, not to fall into the enemy's hands, he made an exceeding great pile in the palace, heaped up there all the gold and silver and the royal apparel, and having shut up his concubines and eunuchs in the house formed in the midst of the pile, consumed himself and all the royalties with them all. The rebels, hearing that Sardanapalus had perished, possessed themselves of the city, entering by the broken part of the wall."

Yet Nahum had also prophesied<sup>b</sup>; "the fire shall devour thy bars;" "fortify thy strong holds, there shall the fire devour thee;" "I will burn her chariots in the smoke," and all the ruins of Nineveh still speak from beneath the earth where they lie interred, that, overthrown as they have been by some gigantic power, fire consumed them within. "The palaces of Khorsabad (Dur Sarjina) and Nimrud shew equal traces of fire with those of Koyunjik." "The recent excavations have shown that fire was a great instrument in the destruction of the Nineveh palaces. Calcined alabaster, masses of charred wood and charcoal, colossal statues split through with the heat, are met with in parts of the Ninevite mounds, and attest the veracity of prophecy." "It is evident from the ruins that Khorsabad and Nimroud were sacked, and set on fire."

Yet this does not exhaust the fulness of the prophecy. Nahum not only foretold the destruction of Nineveh, that it should be empty, void, waste, there is no healing of thy bruise, but in emphatic words, that its site also should be a desolation. With an overrunning flood He shall make the place thereof (mekomah) a desolation<sup>c</sup>. This was then new in the history of the world. Cities have remained, while empires passed away. Rome, Constantinople, Athens, Damascus, Alexandria, Venice, abide, although their political might is extinct. No or Thebes itself survived its capture by Sargon and a yet later loss of its inhabitants nearly two centuries, when the more fatal conquest of Cambyes, and perhaps the rise of Memphis perpetuated its destruction. Nahum foretells emphatically as to Nineveh, "He will make the place thereof an utter consumption." Not only would God destroy the then Nineveh; but the very place or site thereof should be an utter desolation. There was, then, no instance of so great a city passing away. Such had not been Babylonian, Assyrian, Egyptian policy. It had become an established policy in Sennacherib's time to remove populations, not to destroy cities. And these two policies were incompatible. For a conqueror who would remove populations must have, whither to remove them. Nineveh itself had conquered Babylon and Shushan, and the cities of the Medes; but had placed her own lieutenants in them. The mere destruction of such a city as Nineveh was "contrary to experience." Even later than this, Babylon, notwithstanding its rebellions, was spared by its first conqueror, and survived to be the grave of its second, Alexander. Xenophon describes Nineveh under the name of Mespila (of which Mosul has been supposed to be a corruption) "a wall, void, large, lying against the city—the basement was of polished stone, full of shells, its width 50 feet, its height 50 feet. Thereon was built a wall of brick, its breadth 50 feet, the height 100; the circuit was six farsangs," i. e. 22½ miles. The shell remained; the tumult of life was gone. Its protecting bulwarks remained; all, which they protected, had disappeared. They had forgotten already on the spot what it had been or by whom it had perished. "The Medes inhabited it formerly. It was said that Media, a king's wife, had fled thither, when the Medes were losing their power through the Persians. The Persian king, besieging this city, could not take it, either by time or force; but Zeus made the inhabitants senseless, and so it was taken." A little later, Alexander marched over its site to gain the world, not knowing that a world-empire, like that which he gave his life to found, was buried under his feet<sup>d</sup>. Gaugamela, near which Darius lost his empire, must have been close to its site. Yet three centuries, and history, not its mere neighbours only, had forgotten when it had perished. Strabo says<sup>e</sup>, "It was effaced immediately after the destruction of the Syrians." Nearly two centuries later is Lucian's saying, "Nineveh has perished, and there is no trace left where it once was." Yet before this time, in the reign of Claudius, the Romans had built a new Nineveh which they called by his name "Ninive Claudiopoli." In the 6th century, it is mentioned as a Christian see<sup>f</sup>. Its episcopate was taken away, probably on account of its decline, early in the 9th century; and it was united to Mosul<sup>g</sup>. It was still in being at the beginning of the 14th century<sup>h</sup>. Yet, in the 12th century, as a whole, "it was desolate, but there were there many villages and castles." This was not the Nineveh of prophecy; but it too was swept away, and a few coins alone attest the existence of the Roman city. "The city, and even the ruins of the city," relates Gibbon<sup>i</sup> of the last victory of Heraclius,

"had long since disappeared; the vacant space afforded a spacious field for the operation of the two armies." A line of lofty mounds, on the East of Tigris, long drew but a momentary gaze from the passers-by; a few cottages surmounted the heaps, which entombed the palaces of kings, who were the terror of the East; the plough turned up, unheeded, the bricks, which recorded their deeds; the tide of war swept over it anew; the summer's sands again filled up "the stupendous mass of brick-work, occasionally laid bare by the winter rains." The eyes rested on nothing but "the stern shapeless mound, rising like a hill from the scorched plain." "The traveller is at a loss to give any form to the rude heaps, upon which he is gazing. Those of whose works they are the remains, unlike the Roman and the Greek, have left no visible traces of their civilization or of their arts; their influence has long since passed away. The scene around him is worthy of the ruin he is contemplating; desolation meets desolation; a feeling of awe succeeds to wonder, for there is nothing to relieve the mind, to lead to hope, or to tell of what has gone by. Those huge mounds of Assyria made a deeper impression upon me, gave rise to more serious thoughts and more earnest reflection, than the temples of Baalbec and the theatres of Ionia."

In 1827, Buckingham still wrote<sup>1</sup>: "we came in about an hour to the principal mounds which are thought to mark the site of the ancient Nineveh. There are four of these mounds, disposed in the form of a square; and these, as they shew neither bricks, stones, nor other materials of building, but are in many places overgrown with grass, resemble the mounds left by entrenchments and fortifications of ancient Roman camps. The longest of these mounds runs nearly N. and S. and consists of several ridges of unequal height, the whole appearing to extend for four or five miles in length. There are three other distinct mounds, which are all near to the river, and in the direction of E. and W.—There are appearances of mounds and ruins extending for several miles to the southward; and still more distinctly seen to the Northward of this, though both are less marked than the mounds of the centre. The space between these is a level plain, over every part of the face of which, broken pottery, and the other usual debris of ruined cities are seen scattered about." "Mounds and smaller heaps of ruins were scattered widely over the plain, sufficient to prove, that the site of the original city occupied a vast extent." Niebuhr had ridden through Nineveh unknowingly. "I did not learn that I was at so remarkable a spot, till near the river. Then they showed me a village on a great hill, which they call Nunia, and a mosque, in which the Prophet Jonah was buried. Another hill in this district is called Kalla Nunia, or the Castle of Nineveh. On that lies a village Koindsjug. At Mosul, where I dwelt close by the Tigris, they showed me in addition the walls of Nineveh, which in my journey through I had not observed, but supposed to be a set of hills." "It is well known," begins an account of the recent discoveries<sup>2</sup>, "that in the neighbourhood of Mosul, travellers had observed some remarkable mounds, resembling small hills, and that Mr. Rich had, thirty years ago, called attention to one called Koyunjik, in which fragments of sculpture and pottery had been frequently discovered."

And yet, humanly speaking, even if destroyed, it was probable before-hand, that it would not altogether perish. For a town near its site was needed for purposes of commerce. Of the two routes of commerce from the Persian gulf to the North by the Euphrates or by the Tigris, the Tigris-route was free from the perils of the arid wilderness, through which the line by the Euphrates passed. If, for the downward course, the Euphrates itself was navigable, yet the desert presented a difficulty for caravans returning upwards from the Persian gulf. Arrian, who mentions the two lines of travel, says that Alexander, having crossed the Euphrates at Thapsacus, chose the less direct line by the Tigris, as<sup>3</sup> having a better supply of all things, food for his cavalry, and a less scorching heat. The mention of Haran (afterwards Carrhæ) Canneh, and Asshur in Ezekiel, (in one verse<sup>4</sup>) seems to indicate the continuation of the same line of commerce with Tyre, which must have existed from præhistoric times (i. e. from times of which we have no definite historic account), since there is no ground to question the statement of the Phœnicians themselves in Herodotus, that they had come from the Erythræan sea<sup>5</sup>, i. e. the Persian gulf. The later hindrances to the navigation of the Tigris by the great dams (probably for irrigation), were of Persian date; but they could have had no great effect on the actual commerce; since for the greater part of the upward course on the Tigris line, this also must, on account of the rapidity of the river, have been by caravans. The route was still used in the middle ages<sup>6</sup>. "The ancient road and the modern one on the upper Tigris follow, pretty nearly throughout, the same line, it being determined by the physical necessities of the soil." In the 16th century, "from the head of the Persian gulf two commercial lines existed: by one of them goods were carried some way up the Euphrates, and then by land to Bir, Aleppo, Iskenderun. By the other they followed the Tigris to Baghdad and were carried by Diyar-Bekr and Sivas to Terabuzum. [But Mosul was necessarily on the way from Baghdad to Diyar Bekr]. Mosul still lies on the line of commerce, from the Persian gulf, Basrah, Baghdad, Mosul, Mardin, Diyar-Bekr to Iskenderun, the port of Aleppo<sup>7</sup>, or Trebizond [Tarabuzum<sup>8</sup>]. It still carries on some commerce with Kurdistan and other provinces<sup>9</sup> [besides Diyar-Bekr and Baghdad]. Col. Chesney, in 1850, advocated the advantages of extending the line of commerce by British stations at Diyar-Bekr and Mardin, in addition to and connection with those already existing at Baghdad and Mosul<sup>10</sup>. There is, in fact, a consent as to this. Layard writes; "The only impediment between the Syrian coast and the Tigris and Euphrates in any part of their course, arises from the want of proper security. The navigation of the Persian gulf is, at all times, open and safe; and a glance at the map will shew that a line through the Mediterranean, the port of Suedia, Aleppo, Mosul, Baghdad, Busrah, and the Indian Ocean to Bombay is as direct as can well be desired. With those prospects, and with the incalculable advantages, which a flourishing commerce and a safe and speedy transit through, perhaps, the richest portions of its dominions would confer upon the Turkish empire, it would seem that more than Eastern apathy is shown in not taking some steps, tending to restore security to the country watered by the Tigris and Euphrates." Ainsworth suggests a still wider commerce, of which Mosul might be the centre. "With a tranquil state of the surrounding country, Mosul presents mercantile advantages of no common order.—There are several roads open to Persia, across the mountains; a transit from five to seven days, and by which, considering the short distance and good roads from Mosul to Iskenderun, British manufactures might be distributed into the heart of Persia, in a time and at an expense, which the line of Trebizond Erzurum and Tabriz, that of Bushire and Baghdad, or the Russian line of Astrakhan Bakhu and Mazenderan can never rival."

But although marked out by these advantages for continuance, even when its power was gone, Nineveh was to perish and it perished. Nor ought it to be alleged, that in other cases too, "if the position of the old capital was deemed, from political or commercial reasons, more advantageous than any other, the population was settled in its neighbourhood, as at Delhi, not amidst its ruins." For 1) there was, at the time of Nahum, no experience of the destruction of any such great city as Nineveh; 2) In the case of conquest, the capital of the conquering empire became, ipso facto, the capital of the whole; but this did not, in itself, involve the destruction of the former. Babylon, from having been the winter-residence of Cyrus, became the chief residence of the Persian Emperor at the time of Alexander, and continued to exist for many centuries, after the foundation of Seleucia, although it ceased to be a great city<sup>1</sup>. And this, notwithstanding its two rebellions under Darius<sup>1</sup>, and that under Xerxes<sup>2</sup>. There was no ground of human policy against Nineveh's continuing, such as Mosul became, any more than Mosul itself. It existed for some time, as a Christian See.

The grandeur, energy, power, vividness of Nahum, naturally can be fully felt only in his own language. The force of his brief prophecy is much increased by its unity. Nahum had one sentence to pronounce, the judgements of God upon the power of this world, which had sought to annihilate the kingdom of God. God, in His then kingdom in Judah, and the world, were come face to face. What was to be the issue? The entire final utter overthrow of whatever opposed God. Nahum opens then with the calm majestic declaration of the majesty of God; Who God is, against whom they rebelled; the madness of their rebellion, and the extinction of its chief: (c. i.)<sup>3</sup> then in detail, what was to come long after that first overthrow, the siege and capture of Nineveh itself, (c. 2.); then, in wider compass, the overthrow of the whole power (c. 3.) It was to be the first instance, in the history of mankind, of a power so great, perishing and for ever. Nahum's office was not, as Jonah's, to the people itself. There is then no call to repentance, no gleam of God's mercy towards them in this life. Nineveh was to perish wholly, as the habitable world had perished in the time of Noah. The only relief is in the cessation of so much violence. There is no human joy expressed at this destruction of the enemy of God and of His people; no sorrow, save that there can be no sorrow; "who will bemoan her? whence shall I find comforters for her?"

In conformity with this concentration of Nahum's subject, there is little in outward style or language to connect him with the other Prophets. His opening (as already observed<sup>4</sup>) bears upon God's declarations of mercy and judgement; but, Nineveh having filled up the measure of its iniquities, he had to exhibit the dark side of those declarations; how much lay in those words, "that will by no means clear the guilty." "Jonah and Nahum form connected parts of one moral history, the remission of God's judgment being illustrated in the one, the execution of it in the other: the clemency and the just severity of the Divine government being contained in the mixed delineation of the two books." His evangelic character just gleams through, in the eight tender words, in which he seems to take breath, as it were; "Tôb Yhvh lemaôz beyômtsarah, veyôdêah chôsê bo," "Good is God (Yhvh), refuge in day of trouble, and knowing trusters in Him"; then again, in the few words, which I think Isaiah expanded, "Lo on the mountains the feet of a good-tidings-bearer, peace-proclaimer." Else there is only the mingled tenderness and austerity of truth, which would sympathise with the human being, but that that object had, by putting off all humanity, alienated all which is man. "Who will bemoan her? Whenceshall I seek comforters for thee?" Who? and Whence? None had escaped evil from her. "Upon whom hath not thy wickedness passed continually?"

It is difficult for us, who have to gather up our knowledge of the sacred language from the fragments which remain, in which also the number of words forms and idioms, which stand out singly here and there, seem but so many specimens of lost treasure, to judge with any certainty, whether any approximation of idiom, which we may observe, implies any connection between the writers in whom it occurs. Nahum has, especially in his picture of the capture of Nineveh, so many of those ἀπαξ λεγόμενα, consisting often of slight modifications<sup>5</sup>, his language is so rich and so original, that one the more doubts whether in those idioms, in which he seems to approximate to other prophets, the expressions in common do not belong to the common stock of the language; and that the more, since mostly<sup>6</sup> part of the idiom only coincides, the rest is different<sup>7</sup>. As for the so-called Syriasm or other peculiarities of language which Hitzig would have to be evidences of a later date, and from some of which others would infer that Nahum lived at Nineveh itself, "the wish has been father to the thought." One only solid ground there would be why Nahum should not have written his prophecy, when, according to all history, it could alone have 11, חללה, Is. xxi. 8. But in a) כלל נחם is an idiom used not in Is. only but in Jeremiah (5 times) in Ezekiel (twice) Zephaniah and Nehemiah. It is then an ordinary Hebrew idiom. The peculiarity of Isaiah, that in both places (Is. x. 23, xxviii. 22) he adds נחמה, does not occur in Nahum. Nahum also has not the verb נחם, which Isaiah uses in 5 places; Isaiah does not use the noun נחם, which Nahum has, and which occurs in a Psalm of David (xxxii. 6). Nahum too speaks of a flood which shall pass over and overwhelm; Isaiah, of a man who should pass over and pass away. In b) there is only in common, that Isaiah joins the two like-sounding words נחם and כלל as active verbs (of which, the word common to the two prophets must be older than the Prophet Nahum (comp. "Balak" in the Pent.). Nahum unites two nouns, one from a different root נחם, the other a pass. intens. part. נחמה, as an abstract noun. The gradual lengthening of the alliterate form occurs in Nahum only. Two of the three words in Nahum are נחם; c) The mention of חללה, "great writhing anguish," in connection with the loins, is more remarkable, since חללה occurs in those places only and Ez. xxx. 4.9 (with the same constr. with ב); yet נחמה (although not חללה) occurs with נחמה Ps. lxxvi. 11. It may then only be an accidental coincidence of the same term.

O. Strauss thinks that d) Nah. i. 13 is from Is. x. 27; e) iii. 5 from Is. xlvii. 2. 3; f) Nah. iii. 7 from Is. li. 10. But in d and e there is no characteristic word the same; in Nah. i. 13 there is only the common imagery of breaking the yoke. נחם masc. occurs in Nahum only; נחם נחם in Ps. ii. 3 (of men rebelling) and Jerem. 3 times. It is then a common idiom. In f there is the correspondence of the idiom נחם נחם in Is. (which also occurs Jer. xv. 6) in N. נחם נחם, but with the difference that in Is. God speaks of the heaviness of a sorrow which He will comfort; Nahum speaks of desolation which none can comfort. The construction of נחם with ל occurs Job ii. 11, xlii. 11, Jer. xvi. 5, xlii. 10, xlviii. 17; in Job and Ps. lxxix. 21 נחם is united with נחם. The expression seems then to belong to the common stock of the language; the idiom נחם נחם "Who (in what character) shall I comfort thee?" is peculiar to Isaiah.

Hitzig further would have it, that, "נחמה" occurs in N. iii. 10 exactly as in Is. xxiii. 9 alone besides; "whereas the only correspondence is, that Isaiah has the idiom, 'honoured of earth,' "all honoured of earth," נחמה נחמה; Nahum has, with the affix, "her honoured," נחמה נחמה as Ps. cxlix. 8. נחמה נחמה.

7 Of the forms or words, which Hitzig would make characteristic of a later time נחמה i. 8 is only orthographically different from the more common, נחמה; yet not only does נחמה occur Job ix. 17, and the masc. נחמה, Is. xxviii. 2, but the verb is written with נחמה in the same meaning Ps. l. 3, lviii. 10, Job xxvii. 21.

8 נחמה occurs in Jos. xxiv. 19, the oldest book next to the Pentateuch, and having much in common with it (see on Dan. p. 312 note 2), and in no later book. נחמה occurs 5 times in the Pentateuch; this form נחמה (not נחמה) survived in the Chaldee.

9 נחמה iii. 18, is simply Nif. from נחם, a word as old as the Pentateuch, since the river, Pishon, נחם, is derived from it. Hitzig obtains his "pronunciation" by making it kal, נחמה, a word not extant in Heb.

4) "The form of the suffix of the 2nd person, ii. 14," נחמה, which has been urged by all writers on his side, is the more singular ground of argument, because it turns entirely on the vowels, which only represent a tradition of the expiring language. Gesenius calls it "an especial form, which perhaps ought properly to be pronounced נחמה, as masc., out of which the punctuator first made נחמה, in order in some sort of way to indicate the feminine" (Lehrg. p. 216). Written נחמה נחמה, it is only the full and original form of the pronominal affix, נחמה (from נחמה for נחמה), as it is found in the Pentateuch, נחמה Gen. iii. 9, נחמה Ex. xiii. 16, נחמה Ex. xxix. 35. Nahum chose it probably as a fuller form. It occurs in a Psalm of David, cxxxix. 5, at the close, נחמה, and in Jer. xxix. 25, נחמה; as also with the verb, נחמה 1 Kgs. xviii. 44, and, in the pause, נחמה Prov. ii. 11, נחמה, 1 Kings xviii. 10. Mas. have, some נחמה (19 De Rossi, 3 by correction, and 8 early Edd. De R.) "many have נחמה"; 8 of De R. and 3 or 4 in the first instance, had the regular נחמה. The messengers were the king's messengers (Is. xxxvi. 2, 12, 18, xxxvii. 4, 6, 9, 17, 24.) and so the masculine form is in its place. Punctuators probably (as Ges. conjectured) wished to assimilate it to the preceding feminines; Ewald lays down that נחמה is a dialectic difference (p. 638 note) and uses it as an argument for Nahum's living near Nineveh (Proph. i. 850). Davidson (iii. 801.) follows Hitzig.

5) "The form of the suffix of the 3rd person, i. 18, ii. 4. comp. Hab. iii. 10." The form נחמה lies nearer to the original נחמה, than the contracted נחמה; it also occurs in the word נחמה, 14 times in the Pentateuch (in Gen. 8 times, Levit. 5 times, Deut. once); it occurs most (Ges. observes, Lehrg. p. 218) in words ending in נחמה, as נחמה 10 times (8 in Levit.) נחמה 7 times (6 in Gen. Ex. Lev.) נחמה in Ps. i. Ezek. twice, Jerem. once; נחמה in Gen. 4 times, Exod. twice, Job twice; although נחמה absolutely occurs 3 times only, נחמה is the rule; it occurs 114 times, of which 43 are in the Pentateuch. The form נחמה also occurs in נחמה Jud. xix. 24, נחמה Job xxv. 8. It is united with the plur. נחמה in נחמה Prov. xxix. 18, and נחמה in נחמה 1 Sam. xxx. 26, Job xlii. 10; also נחמה Hab. iii. 10, נחמה Job xxiv. 23. It is obviously used by Nahum for its more stately sound.

6) "The meaning of נחמה iii. 8," is one attributed to it by Hitz. only.

7) "As Pilpel occurs more and more in later times, so נחמה ii. 11, (comp. נחמה ii. only occurs in Is. xxi. 8, Ez. xxx. 4. 9." Pilpel is formed on exactly the same principle, as the other rarer intensive conjugations, the doubling of those letters of the root, most capable of being doubled. נחמה, it occurs from Genesis downwards. The use of the word נחמה by two contemporaries, Isaiah and Nahum, was nothing remarkable.

8) "So, plainly נחמה ii. 8 could only in later times be used transitively, otherwise than as united with נחמה." Why? If נחמה is transitive in the phrase, נחמה, "restore the captivity" of Jacob, the corresponding phrase, נחמה נחמה is but a variation of the phrase, such as would naturally occur in any original writer. נחמה is transitive, also in Ps. lxxxv. 5, and Ezek. xlvii. 7, (since if intrans., as Abulwalid pointed out, it would have been נחמה נחמה) if not in Num. x. 36. Gesenius also pointed out that the corresponding Arab נחמה is both transitive, and intransitive, so that the use of the causative conj. נחמה is dialectic, according to Djauhari, or less pure (See Lane sub v. T. i. p. 1038). It is consistent in Hengst. to deny the transitive meaning of נחמה altogether, but not to make any idiomatic difference between נחמה נחמה and נחמה נחמה, as belonging to different dates.

9) "נחמה" (ii. 2) in the sense of munition, first occurs in the Chronicles." In the Chronicles, the phrase is different. The idiom is a slight variation of the old masc., נחמה Ps. xxxi. 22, lx. 11 (which the Chronicles too has, 2 C. viii. 5). The Chronicles, on whatever ground, mostly adopt the feminine form in speaking historically of the fortified cities built in Judah; once in the sing. נחמה 2 C. xiv. 5; else with two plurals נחמה 2 C. xi. 10, 23. xii. 4, xiv. 5, xxi. 8. In one place only, having ended a verse, xi. 10, "and in Benjamin נחמה," the writer begins the next, (omitting the נחמה) "and he strengthened נחמה." Nor is there any thing characteristic of a later period in the use of the feminine; and, any how, since the Chronicles were compiled after the captivity, probably by Ezra, the use of the same form could have proved nothing, as to whether a book were written 85 years, sooner or later, before the captivity.

"Also the Hebrew of Nahum is in part impure; נחמה iii. 17, is probably not Semitic." It probably is Semitic (see above p. 858) and Assyrian. The occurrence of what probably is a title of an Assyrian commander, not only fits the times of Nahum, when Assyrian invasions had begun, but the occurrence of an official title, (like that of "Pechah" elsewhere, see Daniel the Prophet pp. 570, 571,) without any Syriasm, belongs to Nahum's time and life in Palestine. When three officers of Hezekiah understood Assyrian (Is. xxxvi. 11.), there is nothing surprising in the mention of an Assyrian title. Pechah is also an Assyrian title, occurring in the Inscriptions in the plural "pahati," Oppert Reports p. 51. 52. 53. 57. 66. 74. "Tartan," in Isaiah and 2 Kings, is also probably an Assyrian title, since Rabaris, "Chief of the Eunuchs," Rab-shakeh, Chief-cupbearer," (with which Tartan is united in 2 Kings xviii. 17) are names of officers. Yet no satisfactory etymology has been found for "Tartan."

10) נחמה, iii. 4, stands in Arabic meaning." The coincidence with Arabic would have proved nothing; but Nahum uses נחמה in its common meaning. In Arabic also it signifies "deceived," not (as Hitzig would have it) "meshed."

11) "נחמה, ii. 8, in Syriac meaning." נחמה, not in Syriac only, but in Arabic, signifies to be "violently out of breath;" but this, which is its only meaning which could be brought to bear on this passage, does not suit it, whereas that suggested by the Hebrew itself does. In Nahum it is evidently a modification of the biliteral נחמה, in the same sense as נחמה which is used of the low moaning of the dove, Is. xxxviii. 14, lix. 11; and the subst. נחמה "moaning" is united with נחמה and נחמה (for נחמה) Ezek. ii. 10. Another modification of the biliteral נחמה is נחמה Ps. v. 2, xxxix. 4.

12) "and נחמה, iii. 2 (only besides in the song of Deborah Jud. v. 23) is probably equally only a Syriasm;" i. e. supposing its meaning to be derived from נחמה "circle," the substitution of נחמה for נחמה occurs oftenest in Aramaic. In the root נחמה itself however, the nearest correspondence of Hebrew with any Semitic dialect is not with the Syriac but with the Arabic; נחמה "generation" and the Arab. נחמה 'prolonged time,' but also the period of life (see Lane p. 928); whereas the Syr. נחמה only signifies "a mill." But Hitzig himself sets aside these last, with the observation, "these appearances however are sufficiently explained, if the home of Deborah was also Nahum's country, a border-country towards Syria, inhabited in part by non-Israelites."

13) Hitzig makes neither נחמה the Queen's name and so Assyrian, nor נחמה, although he has his own fantastic meaning for each, derived from misapplication of the Arabic. The alleged Syriasm in נחמה rests on an odd ground-work. The Syriac word has not been found in any Syriac author; in one of three Syro-Arab. Lexica (Bar-Bahlul's) it is explained by the Arabic word, "fulādso." This in its turn is interpreted by the Persian, which again has, in Vüllers, no Persian etymology. On the other hand the Arabic "falāda" "cut," conj. ii. "cut to pieces," does give a good etymology for any sharp instrument, as the "scythe" of a scythed chariot.

Yet this is the evidence on which Davidson tells the unlearned (Intro. iii. 801), "The language is pure and classical with a few exceptions, as נחמה to mourn, ii. 8, נחמה iii. 2, נחמה ii. 4, which are Syriasm.—These Syriasm cannot well be explained by the native locality of the prophet, which was towards the border-land of Syria and inhabited any interest for Judah, long before the event itself, viz. if He to Whom all, past and future, are present, could not or did not declare beforehand things to come<sup>a</sup>. If there be prophecy, the siege of Nineveh might be as vividly presented to the Prophet's mind, as if he saw it with his bodily eyes<sup>a</sup>.

in part by people who were not Israelites, because other prophets of the Northern kingdom do not use Syriac words or idioms. They imply intimate contact with a people beyond Palestine." Yet נר does not, in this sense, exist beyond Palestine; נר was, in the time of the Judges, used within it, and the Arabic does give an etymology for נר, natural and adequate, which Syriac does not. The only difficulty is, that the Arabic word for "steel" is not a pure Semitic form, like the Hebrew, but a Persian, "fūlādo" or "fālūdo." Yet the Arabic has also the genuine Arabic form "mafūdo" "formed of steel," of a sword. The direct connection of נר with "fūlādo" or "fālūdo" must be given up, since it seems that the direct connection of the Arabic falāda and fūlādo or fālūdo must be abandoned. For Prof. F. Justi whose judgement Prof. Max Müller kindly obtained for me says; "The Arabic fūlādo must be borrowed from the Persian pūlādo, not conversely (as Freytag and Vüllers also assume in their Lexica); for Persian retains the f in Arabic words which it adopts, but Arabic changes a Persian p into f, because it has no p. So Arabic again changes a Persian d, especially between or after vowels, always into ds. The relation of the Arabic fūlādo, fālūdo, with the root falāda is consequently only apparent, whence the derivation of נר from is also shown to be untenable, especially since this Hebrew root is not evidenced but assumed." Yet as relates to the Hebrew נר, since the Heb. נ is often interchanged with the Arab. ds ("which in some Arab. dialects is pronounced d" Ges.), the etym. from the Arabic falāda, "cuts," lies nearer to it than any other, designating a sharp instrument. It is remarkable that the Heb-Arab. Lexicogr., Abraham B. David and Abulwalid, were not aware of any connected Arabic root, both regarding נר as inverted from נר. The Syr. נר "spark" or "sparks" (which Ew. compares, Proph. ii. p. 11) is too remote, insulated, uncertain, not being connected with any known root, and being written also נר. See Dr. P. Smith's Lex. Syr. s. v. "The Arab. נר" (Ib.) must be a mis-print.

<sup>a</sup> "Did Nahum predict the downfall of Nineveh a century before the event? If he was a younger contemporary of Isaiah, he did so. He prophesied, say some, about the 14th year of Hezekiah and graphically painted the overthrow of Assyria's metropolis. The interval consists of about one hundred years. Is not the analogy of Prophecy violated here? If a specific event be foretold long before it happened, what becomes of the canon or principle that prophecy presents nothing more than the provision of events in the immediate future? [Dr. Ds. italics] The principle in question is almost axiomatic." [Introd. iii. 208.] It passes for an axiom in the school, whose results Dr. Davidson gives to the English; i. e. it is a petitio principii applied to each prophecy in turn.

CHAPTER I.

1 The Majesty of God in goodness to his people, and severity against his enemies.

1. The burden<sup>1</sup>. "The word 'massa' [burden] is never placed in the title, save when the vision is heavy and full of burden and toil." Of Nineveh. The prophecy of Nahum again is very stern and awful. Nineveh, after having "repented at the preaching of Jonah," again fell back into the sins whereof it had repented, and added this, that, being employed by God to chasten Israel, it set itself, not to inflict the measure of God's displeasure, but to uproot the chosen people, in whom was promised the birth of Christ<sup>3</sup>. It was then an Antichrist, and a type of him yet to come. Jonah's mission was a call to repentance, a type and forerunner of all God's messages to the world, while the day of grace and the world's probation lasts. Nahum, "the full of exceeding comfort," as his name means, or "the comforter" is sent to<sup>4</sup> reprove the world of judgement. He is sent, prominently, to pronounce on Nineveh its doom when its day of grace should be over, and in it, on the world, when it and<sup>5</sup> all the works therein shall be burned up. In few words he directly comforteth the people of God<sup>6</sup>; else the comfort even to her is indirect, in the destruction of her oppressor. Besides this, there is nothing of mercy or call to repentance, or sorrow for their desolation<sup>7</sup>; but rather the pouring out of the vials of the wrath of God on her and on the evil world, which to the end resists all God's calls and persecuteth His people. The book of Jonah proclaimeth God, a gracious God and merciful, slow to anger and of great kindness, Who repenteth Him of the evil. Nahum speaketh of the same attributes, yet closes with, and will not at all acquit the wicked. "The Merciful Himself, Who is by Nature Merciful, the Holy Spirit, seemeth, speaking in the prophet, to laugh at their calamity." All is desolation, and death. The aggression against God is retorted upon the aggressor; one reeling strife for life or death; then the silence of the graveyard. And so, in its further meaning, "the prophecy belongs to the close of the world and the comfort of the saints therein, so that whatsoever they see in the world, they may hold cheap, as passing away and perishing and prepare themselves for the Day of Judgement, when the Lord shall be the Avenger of the true Assyrian."

<sup>1</sup> So, beyond question, מַשָּׂא should be rendered. Since מַשָּׂא is no where used of mere speaking, it is beforehand improbable that מַשָּׂא should mean "speech;" and this, apart from the consideration that "the speech of Babylon, Damascus, Egypt, Moab, Tyre, Dumah, "the valley of vision," "the desert of the sea," "Nineveh," would be an in-expressive expression for a speech concerning them. For, in one place only, (Is. xxi. 13) is it expressed that the burden is upon (2) Arabia. Else prepositions are only used to determine the relation of מַשָּׂא with the object (2, Zech. ix. 1. 7, Ib. xii. 1. 7, Mal. i. 1.) when that object is already separated from מַשָּׂא; "the burden of the word of the Lord upon" Ib. מַשָּׂא, "lift up" when used alone for מַשָּׂא "lifted up" [the voice], is always used of "loud speaking," Is. xlii. 2, 11, Job xxi. 12, and so Is. iii. 7, "loudly protest." Eleven times in Isaiah (xlii. 1, xiv. 28, xv. 1, xvii. 1, xix. 1, xxi. 1, 11, 13, xxii. 1, xxiii. 1, xxx. 6.) in Ezek. xii. 10, Hab. i. 1, Mal. i. 1, מַשָּׂא is followed by a heavy prophecy, as it is here. Zech. ix. 1, also is a heavy prophecy against those whom Alexander would conquer; Zech. xii. 2, begins with a heavy prophecy against Judah and Jerusalem. Prov. xxx, xxxi, are rebukes; in Prov. xxxi, it is expressly added, "wherewith his mother admonished him." The blasphemy also, rebuked by Jeremiah (xxiii. 33, 34, 36), presupposes that the meaning of מַשָּׂא, at which they mocked, was a heavy prophecy. "What fresh burden has God for us?" they asked mockingly, not believing that the evil which Jeremiah prophesied would come. In regard to the use of מַשָּׂא (1 C. xv. 23, 27), where the E. V. has, "for song," if it related to the voice at all, it must (like the "on Alamoth," "on Sheminith" vv. 20, 21, which probably designate two notes of music, "treble" and the "octave," "bass") have signified some character of voice, as "alto," according to the meaning of מַשָּׂא, "lift up."

PART IV.

THE burden of Nineveh. The book of the vision of Nahum the Elkoshite.

Before
cir. 718.

2 || God is jealous, and the Lord revengis a jealous God, and a revenger, &c. Ex. 20. 5. & 34. 14. Deut. 4. 24. Josh. 24. 19, Deut. 32. 35. Ps. 94. 1. Isa. 59. 18.

So our Lord sets forth the end of the world as the comfort of the elect. When these things begin to come to pass, then look up and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh<sup>8</sup>. This is the highest fulfilment of the prophecy; for "then will the wrath of God against the wicked be fully seen, Who now patiently waiteth for them for mercy."

The book of the vision of Nahum the Elkoshite. "He first defines the object of the prophecy, whereto it looks; then states who spake it and whence it was;" the human instrument which God employed. The fuller title, "The book of the vision of Nahum," (which stands alone) probably expresses that it was not, like most prophecies, first delivered orally, and then collected by the prophet, but was always (as it is so remarkably) one whole. "The weight and pressure of this 'burden' may be felt from the very commencement of the book."

God is jealous and the Lord avengeth. Rather (as the E. M.) <sup>10</sup> A God very jealous and avenging is the Lord. The Name of God, YHVH, "He Who Is," the Unchangeable, is thrice repeated, and thrice it is said of Him that He is an Avenger. It sheweth both the certainty and greatness of the vengeance, and that He Who inflicteth it, is the All-Holy Trinity, Who have a care for the elect. God's jealousy is twofold. It is an intense love, not bearing imperfections or unfaithfulness in that which It loves, and so chastening it; or not bearing the ill-dealings of those who would injure what It loves, and so destroying them. To Israel He had revealed Himself, as <sup>11</sup> a jealous God, visiting iniquity but shewing mercy; here, as jealous for His people against those who were purely His enemies and the enemies of His people<sup>12</sup>, and so His jealousy burneth to their destruction, in that there is in them no good to be refined, but only evil to be consumed.

The titles of God rise in awe; first, intensely jealous<sup>13</sup> and an Avenger; then, an Avenger and a Lord of wrath; One Who hath it laid up with Him, at His Command, and the more terrible, because it is so; the Master of it, (not, as man, mastered by it<sup>14</sup>); having it, to withhold or to discharge; yet so discharging it, at last, the more irrevocably on the finally

But, considering (as Hengstenberg has noticed, Christol. on Zech. ix. 1.) the use of מַשָּׂא in places where it can only mean "burden" as also throughout Num. iv. (10, 24, 27, 31, 32, 47, 49,) it seems probable, that in 1 C. xv. too, it signifies "bearing" (as in E. M. "carriage"). For the "bearing the ark" is spoken of immediately afterwards as a matter of much skill. "When God helped the Levites, the bearers of the ark of the covenant of the Lord," מַשָּׂא (1 C. xv. 26); and the writer speaks of the dress of "all the Levites who bare the ark" "and the singers" v. 27, as two classes. Evon Bertheau defends this meaning, and solidly. In Lam. ii. 14, מַשָּׂא is united with מַשָּׂא "expulsions." The context seems to require more than is in the rendering, "sayings of vanity," which would be less strong than מַשָּׂא "have seen for thee vanity." "The burdens of vanity," which the false prophets professed to see, would be heavy prophecies against the enemy, that they should be driven from the land of Israel. Comp. Zedekiah's enquiry, Jer. xxi. 1, 2, and Hananiah's prophecy Jer. xxviii. 2. 11.

impenitent. And this He says at the last, an Avenger to<sup>1</sup> His adversaries, (lit. "those who hem and narrow Him in"). The word avenged<sup>2</sup> is almost appropriated to God in the Old Testament, as to punishment which He inflicts, or at least causes to be inflicted<sup>3</sup>, whether on individuals<sup>4</sup>, or upon a people, (His own<sup>5</sup> or their enemies<sup>6</sup>), for their misdeeds. In man it is a defect<sup>7</sup>. Personal vengeance is mentioned only in characters, directly or indirectly censured, as Samson<sup>8</sup> or Saul<sup>9</sup>. It is forbidden to man, punished in him, claimed by God as His own inalienable right. <sup>10</sup> Vengeance is Mine and requital. <sup>11</sup> Thou shalt not avenge nor keep up against the children of My people. Yet it is spoken of, not as a mere act of God, but as the expression of His Being. <sup>12</sup> Shall not My soul be avenged of such a nation as this?

And a Reserver of wrath for His enemies, the hardened and unbelieving who hate God, and at last, when they had finally rejected God and were rejected by Him, the object of His aversion. It is spoken after the manner of men, yet therefore is the more terrible. There is that in God, to which the passions of man correspond; they are a false imitation of something which in Him is good, a distortion of the true likeness of God, in which God created us and which man by sin defaced. <sup>13</sup> Pride doth imitate exaltedness: whereas Thou Alone art God exalted over all. Ambition, what seeks it, but honours and glory? whereas Thou Alone art to be honoured above all and glorious for evermore. The cruelty of the great would fain be feared; but who is to be feared but God Alone, out of Whose power what can be wrested or withdrawn, when, or where, or whither, or by whom? The tenderesses of the wanton would fain be counted love: yet is nothing more tender than Thy charity; nor is aught loved more healthfully than that Thy truth, bright and beautiful above all. Curiosity makes semblance of a desire of knowledge; whereas Thou supremely knowest all. Yea, ignorance and foolishness itself is cloked under the name of simplicity and uninjuriousness: because nothing is found more single than Thee; and what less injurious, since they are his own works which injure the sinner? Yea, sloth would fain be at rest; but what stable rest besides the Lord? Luxury affects to be called plenty and abundance; but Thou art the fullness and never-failing plenteousness of incorruptible pleasures. Prodigality presents a shadow of liberality: but Thou art the most overflowing Giver of all good. Covetousness would possess many things; and Thou possessest all things. Envy disputes for excellency: what more excellent than Thou? Anger seeks revenge: who revenges more justly than Thou? Fear startles at things unwonted or sudden, which endanger things beloved, and takes fore-thought for their safety; but to Thee, what unwonted or sudden, or who separateth from Thee what Thou lovest? Or where but with Thee is unshaken safety? Grief pines away for things lost, the delight of its

desires; because it would have nothing taken from it, as nothing can from Thee. Thus doth the soul seek without Thee what she findeth not pure and untainted, till she returns to Thee. Thus all pervertedly imitate Thee, who remove far from Thee, and lift themselves up against Thee. But even by thus imitating Thee, they imply Thee to be the Creator of all nature; whence there is no place, whither altogether to retire from Thee." And so, in man, the same qualities are good or bad, as they have God or self for their end. <sup>14</sup> "The joy of the world is a passion. Joy in the Holy Spirit or to joy in the Lord is a virtue. The sorrow of the world is a passion. The sorrow according to God which worketh salvation is a virtue. The fear of the world which hath torment, from which a man is called fearful, is a passion. The holy fear of the Lord, which abideth for ever, from which a man is called reverential, is a virtue. The hope of the world, when one's hope is in the world or the princes of the world, is a passion. Hope in God is a virtue, as well as faith and charity. Though these four human passions are not in God, there are four virtues, having the same names, which no one can have, save from God, from the Spirit of God." In man they are "passions," because man is so far "passive" and suffers under them, and, through original sin, cannot hinder having them, though by God's grace he may hold them in. God, without passion and in perfect holiness, has qualities, which in man were jealousy, wrath, vengeance, unforgiveness, a "rigor of perfect justice towards the impenitent, which punisheth so severely, as though God had fury;" only, in Him it is righteous to punish man's unrighteousness. Elsewhere it is said, <sup>15</sup> God keepeth not for ever, or it is asked, <sup>16</sup> will He keep for ever? and He answers, <sup>17</sup> Return, and I will not cause Mine anger to fall upon you; for I am merciful, saith the Lord, I will not keep for ever. Man's misdeeds and God's displeasure remain with God, to be effaced on man's repentance, or <sup>18</sup> by his hardness and impenitent heart man treasureth up unto himself wrath in the day of wrath and of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, Who will reward each according to his works.

3. The Lord is slow to anger. Nahum takes up the words of Jonah<sup>19</sup> as he spoke of God's attributes towards Nineveh, but only to shew the opposite side of them. Jonah declares how God is slow to anger, giving men time of repentance, and if they do repent, repenting Him also of the evil; Nahum, that the long-suffering of God is not slackness, that He is long-suffering to usward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

And strong in power<sup>20</sup>. Divine long-suffering goes along with Divine power. God can be long-suffering, because He can, whenever He sees good, punish. His long-suffering is a token, not of weakness, but of power. He can allow persons the whole extent of trial, because, when they are past cure, He can end it at once. <sup>21</sup> God is a righteous judge, strong and patient, and God wratheth<sup>22</sup> every day. The wrath cometh only at the last, but it is ever present with God. He cannot but be displeased with the sin ; and so the Psalmist describes in the manner of men the gradual approximation to its discharge. <sup>1</sup> If he (the sinner) will not return [from evil or to God], He will whet His sword ; He hath trodden His bow and directed it : He hath prepared for him instruments of death ; He hath made His arrows burning. We see the arrow with unextinguishable fire, ready to be discharged, waiting for the final decision of the wicked, whether he will repent or not, but that still the Day of the Lord will come<sup>2</sup>. He will not at all acquit<sup>3</sup>. The words occur originally in the great declaration of God's attributes of mercy by Moses, as a necessary limitation of them<sup>4</sup> ; they are continued to God's people, yet with the side of mercy predominant<sup>5</sup> ; they are pleaded to Himself<sup>6</sup> ; they are the sanction of the third commandment<sup>7</sup>. He will not acquit of His own will, apart from His justice. So He saith<sup>8</sup>, I can of Mine own self do nothing, i. e. (in part), not as unjust judges, who call good evil and evil good, following their own will, not the merits of the case ; but, as I hear, I judge, and My judgement is just. He cannot even have mercy and spare unjustly, nor without the lowliness of penitence. Even if it be Jerusalem, over which He wept, or His companion, His own familiar friend<sup>9</sup>, He, Who is no acceptor of persons, cannot of mere favour forgive the impenitent.

The Lord hath His way in the whirlwind and in the storm. The vengeance of God comes at last swiftly, vehemently, fearfully, irresistibly. When they say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them<sup>10</sup>, and all creation stands at the command of the Creator against His enemies. He shall take to Him His jealousy for complete armour, and make the creature His weapon, for the revenge of His enemies<sup>11</sup>.

And the clouds are the dust of His feet. Perhaps the imagery is from the light dust raised by an earthly army, of which Nahum's word is used<sup>12</sup>. The powers of heaven are arrayed against the might of earth. On earth a little dust, soon to subside ; in heaven, the whirlwind and the storm, which sweep away what does not bow before them. The vapours, slight in outward seeming<sup>13</sup>, but formed of countless multitudes of mist-drops, are yet dark and lowering, as they burst, and resistless. "The Feet of God are that power whereby He trampleth upon the ungodly." So it is said to the Son, Sit Thou on My Right Hand until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool. Tempests have also, without figure, been used to overthrow God's enemies<sup>14</sup>.

people, as He did from Pharaoh<sup>16</sup>, the type of all later oppressors, and of Antichrist. His word is with power ; to destroy them at once with one rough word<sup>17</sup>. The restlessness of the barren and troubled sea is an image of the wicked<sup>18</sup>. And drieth up all the rivers, as He did Jordan. His coming shall be far more terrible than when all the hearts of the inhabitants of the land did melt<sup>19</sup>. Bashan languisheth and Carmel ; and the flower of Lebanon languisheth. Bashan was richest in pastures ; Carmel, according to its name, in gardens and vineyards ; Lebanon, in vines also and fragrant flowers<sup>20</sup>, but chiefly in the cedar and cypress ; it had its name from the whiteness of the snow, which rests on its summit. These mountains then together are emblems of richness, lasting beauty, fruitfulness, loftiness ; yet all, even that which by nature is not, in the variety of seasons, wont to fade, dries up and withers before the rebuke of God. But if these things are done in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry ? All freshness, beauty, comeliness, shew of outward nature, shall fade as grass ; all ornament of men's outward graces or gifts, all mere shew of goodness, shall fall off like a leaf and perish. If the glory of nature perishes before God, how much more the pride of man ! Bashan also was the dwelling-place of the race of giants, and near Libanus was Damascus ; yet their inhabitants became as dead men and their power shrank to nothing at the word of God.

5. The mountains quaked at Him, and the hills melted, as of their own accord. The words are a renewal of those of Amos<sup>21</sup>. Inanimate nature is pictured as endowed with the terror, which guilt feels at the presence of God. All power, whether greater or less, whatsoever lifteth itself up, shall give way in that Day, which shall be<sup>22</sup> upon all the cedars of Lebanon that are high and lifted up, and upon all the oaks of Bashan, and upon all the high mountains, and upon all the hills that are lifted up. And the earth is burned [rather lifteth itself up<sup>23</sup>] ; as in an earthquake it seems, as it were, to rise and sink down, lifting itself as if to meet its God or to flee. What is strongest, shaketh ; what is hardest, melteth ; yea, the whole world trembleth and is removed. "If," said even Jews of old, "when God made Himself known in mercy, to give the law to His people, the world was so moved at His Presence, how much more, when He shall reveal Himself in wrath !" The words are so great that they bear the soul on to the time, when the heaven and earth shall flee away from the Face of Him Who sitteth on the throne, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat<sup>24</sup>. And since all judgements are images of the Last, and the awe at tokens of God's Presence is a shadow of the terror of that coming, he adds,

6. Who can stand before His indignation? This question appeals to our own consciences, that we cannot<sup>1</sup>. It anticipates the self-conviction at every day of God's visitation, the forerunners of the last. The word rendered "indignation" is reserved almost exclusively to denote the wrath of God<sup>2</sup>. "Who can trust in his own righteousness, and, for the abundance of his works or consciousness of his virtues, not be in need of mercy? Enter not into judgement with Thy servant, O Lord, for in Thy sight shall no man living be justified; and in Job it is said truly, Behold He put no trust in His servants, and His Angels He charged with folly. How much less in them that dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, which are crushed before the moth<sup>3</sup>? It were needless now to prove, that man's own deserts suffice to no one, and that we are not saved but by the grace of God, for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God<sup>4</sup>. Wherefore he saith, before His indignation, standing face to Face before Him in wrath."

lit. in the Face of: guilt cannot look in the face of man, how much less, of God. The bliss of the righteous is the punishment of the wicked, to behold God face to Face. For "who so trusteth in his own works deserveth His indignation, and thinking he standeth, righteously does he fall."

His fury is poured out<sup>5</sup> like fire, sweeping away, like a torrent of molten fire, him who presumeth that he can stand before His Face, as He did the cities of the plain<sup>6</sup>, the image of the everlasting fire, which shall burn up His enemies on every side<sup>7</sup>. And rocks are thrown down. The rocks are like so many towers<sup>8</sup> of nature, broken down and crushed by Him lit. from Him. It needeth not any act of God's. He wills and it is done. Those who harden themselves, are crushed and broken to pieces, the whole fabric they had built for themselves and their defences, crumbling and shivered. If then they, whose hearts are hard as rocks, and bold against all peril, and even Satan himself, whose<sup>9</sup> heart is as firm as a stone, yea, as hard as a piece of the nether millstone, shall be crushed then, who shall abide?

7. The Lord is good: a stronghold in the day of trouble. "Good and doing good," and full of sweetness; alike good and mighty; Good in giving Himself and imparting His goodness to His own; yea<sup>11</sup> none is good, save God; Himself the stronghold wherein His own may take refuge; both in the troubles of this life, in which<sup>12</sup> He will not suffer us to be tempted above that we are able, and in that Day, which shall hem them in on every side, and leave no place of escape except Himself.

And He knoweth them that trust in Him; so as to save them; as Rahab was saved when Jericho perished, and Lot out of the midst of the overthrow and Hezekiah from the host of Sennacherib. He knoweth them with an individual, ever-present, knowledge<sup>13</sup>. He says not only, "He shall own them," but He ever knoweth them. So it is said; <sup>14</sup> The Lord knoweth the way of the righteous, <sup>15</sup> The Lord knoweth the days of the upright; and our Lord says, <sup>16</sup> I know My sheep; and S. Paul, <sup>17</sup> The Lord knoweth them that are His. God speaks of this knowledge also in the past, of His knowledge, when things as yet were not, I have known thee by name; or of lovingkindness in the past, <sup>18</sup> I knew thee in the wilderness, <sup>19</sup> you alone have I known of all the families of the earth, as contrariwise our Lord says, that He shall say to the wicked in the Great Day, <sup>20</sup> I never knew you. That God, being what He is, should take knowledge of us, being what we are, is such wondrous condescension, that it involves a purpose of love, yea, His love towards us, as the Psalmist says admiringly, Lord, what is man that Thou takest knowledge of him<sup>21</sup>?

Them that trust in Him. It is a habit, which has this reward; the trusters in Him<sup>22</sup>, the takers of refuge in Him. It is a continued unvarying trust, to which is shewn this ever-present love and knowledge.

Yet this gleam of comfort only discloseth the darkness of the wicked. Since those who trust God are they whom God knoweth, it follows that the rest He knoweth not. On this opening, which sets forth the attributes of God towards those who defy Him and those who trust in Him, follows the special application to Nineveh.

8. But with an overrunning flood He will make an utter end of the place thereof<sup>23</sup>, i. e. of Nineveh, although not as yet named, except in the title of the prophecy, yet present to the Prophet's mind and his hearers, and that the more solemnly, as being the object of the wrath of God, so that, although unnamed, it would be known so to be. Image and reality, the first destruction and the last which it pictures, meet in the same words. Nineveh itself was overthrown through the swelling of the rivers which flowed round it and seemed to be its defence<sup>24</sup>. Then also, the flood is the tide of armies, gathered from all quarters, Babylonians<sup>25</sup>, Medes, Persians, Arabians, Bactrians, which like a flood should sweep over Nineveh and leave nothing standing. It is also the flood of the wrath of God, in Whose Hands they were, and Who, by them, should make a full end of it, lit. make the place thereof a thing consumed, a thing which has ceased to be. For a while, some ruins existed, whose name and history ceased to be known; soon after, the ruins themselves were effaced and buried<sup>26</sup>. Such was the close of a city, almost coeval with the flood, which had now stood almost as many years as have passed since Christ came, but which now defied God. Marvellous image of the evil world itself, which shall flee away from the Face of Him Who sat on the throne<sup>1</sup>, and there was found no place for it.

And darkness shall pursue His enemies; better, He shall pursue His enemies into darkness<sup>2</sup>. Darkness is, in the O.T., the condition, or state in which a person is, or lives; it is not an agent, which pursues. Isaiah speaks of the <sup>3</sup>inhabitants of darkness<sup>4</sup>, entering into darkness; <sup>5</sup>those who are in darkness. The grave is all<sup>6</sup> darkness,<sup>7</sup> darkness, and the shadow of death. Hence even Jews rendered, "He shall deliver them to hell." Into this darkness it is said, God shall pursue them, as other prophets speak of being driven forth into darkness<sup>9</sup>. The darkness, the motionless drear abode, to which they are driven, anticipates the being cast into the outer darkness, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. "The vengeance of God on" those who remain "His enemies" to the last, "ends not with the death of the body; but evil spirits, who are darkness and not light, pursue their souls, and seize them." They would not hear Christ calling to them, "Walk, while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you." "They are of those that rebel against the light; they know not the ways thereof, nor abide in the paths thereof." "They loved darkness rather than light. And so they were driven into the darkness which they chose and loved."

9. The Prophet had in few words summed up the close of Nineveh; he now upbraids them with the sin, which should bring it upon them, and foretells the destruction of Sennacherib. Nineveh had, before this, been the instrument of chastising Israel and Judah. Now, the capture of Samaria, which had cast off God, deceived and emboldened it. Its king thought that this was the might of his own arm; and likened the Lord of heaven and earth to the idols of the heathen, and said, "Who are they among all the gods of the countries, that have delivered their country out of mine hand, that the Lord should deliver Jerusalem out of mine hand?" He sent<sup>15</sup> to reproach the living God and<sup>16</sup> defied the Holy One of Israel. His blasphemy was his destruction. It was a war, not simply of ambition, or covetousness, but directly against the power and worship of God.

What will ye so mightily<sup>17</sup> devise, imagine against the Lord? He<sup>18</sup> Himself, by Himself, is already making an utter end. It is in store; the Angel is ready to smite. Idle are man's devices, when the Lord doeth. "Take counsel together, and it shall come to nought; speak the word, and it shall not stand: for

God is with us. While the rich man was speaking comfort to his soul as to future years, God was making an utter end. Thou fool, this night shall thy soul be required of thee.

<sup>20</sup> Affliction shall not rise up the second time: as he says afterwards, "Though I have afflicted thee, I will afflict thee no more<sup>21</sup>". God, He had said, is good for a refuge in the day of affliction; now, personifying that affliction, he says, that it should be so utterly broken, that it should rise up no more to vex them, as when a serpent's head is, not wounded only but, crushed and trampled under foot, so that it cannot again lift itself up. The promises of God are conditioned by our not falling back into sin. He saith to Nineveh, "God will not deliver Judah to thee, as He delivered the ten tribes and Samaria." Judah repented under Hezekiah, and He not only delivered it from Sennacherib, but never afflicted them again through Assyria. Renewal of sin brings renewal or deepening of punishment. The new and more grievous sins under Manasseh were punished, not through Assyria but through the Chaldeans.

The words have passed into a maxim, "God will not punish the same thing twice," not in this world and the world to come, i. e. not if repented of. For of the impenitent it is said, "destroy them with a double destruction." Chastisement here is a token of God's mercy; the absence of it, or prosperous sin, of perdition; but if any refuse to be corrected, the chastisement of this life is but the beginning of unending torments.

10. For while they be folden together as thorns<sup>22</sup>, i. e. as confused, intertwined, sharp, piercing, hard to be touched, rending and tearing whosoever would interfere with its tangled ways, and seemingly compact together and strong; and while they are drunken as their drink<sup>24</sup>, not "drinkers<sup>25</sup>" only but literally "drunken," swallowed up, as it were, by their drink which they had swallowed, mastered, overcome, powerless, they shall be devoured as stubble fully dry<sup>26</sup>, rapidly, in an instant, with an empty crackling sound, unresisting, as having nothing in them which can resist. Historically, the great defeat of the Assyrians, before the capture of Nineveh, took place while its king, flushed with success, was giving himself to listlessness; and having distributed to his soldiers victims, and abundance of wine, and other necessaries for banquetting, the whole army<sup>27</sup> was negligent and drunken." In like way Babylon was taken amid the feasting of Belshazzar<sup>28</sup>; Benhadad was smitten, while<sup>29</sup> drinking himself drunk in the pavilions, he and the kings, the thirty and two kings

<sup>20</sup> Others have understood this, "affliction shall not rise up the second time," but shall destroy at once, utterly and finally (comp. 1 Sam. xxvi. 8. 2 Sam. xx. 10.); but 1) the idiom there, "he did not repeat to him," as we say, "he did not repeat the blow," is quite different: 2) it is said, "affliction shall not rise up," itself, as if it could not. The causative of the idiom occurs in 2 Sam. xii. 11. "קָרַע עָלַי אֶת-הַבֶּרֶךְ" "lo, I will cause evil to rise up against thee." <sup>21</sup> v. 12. <sup>22</sup> Jer. xvii. 18. <sup>23</sup> קָרַע עָלַי lit. "quite up to," so as altogether to equal; as חָלַע, Job xi. 7, חָלַע בְּיָדָא, 1 Chr. iv. 27, חָלַע, wine, Is. i. 22. Hos. iv. 16.

<sup>24</sup> As elsewhere חָלַע, Deut. xxi. 20, Pr. xxiii. 20, 21, חָלַע Cheth. Es. xxiii. 42. <sup>25</sup> חָלַע is best united with חָלַע. חָלַע is used of ripe corn, Ex. xxii. 28. Dt. xxii. 9; but this may be so called, from the ear being full. The idiom, in which חָלַע is joined with the verb, חָלַע חָלַע Jer. xii. 6, is different, being derived from a phrase, חָלַע חָלַע "cry aloud, fill," i. e. with a full voice, Jer. iv. 5. Schultens compares Arab. حَلَلَ "he did and filled" = did fully. For the imagery of the devouring of the stubble by fire, see Is. v. 24. xlvii. 14. Jo. ii. 5. Ob. 18. <sup>27</sup> Diod. And so it may well be meant here too, that Sennacherib's army, secure of their prey, were sunk in revelry, already swallowed up by wine, before they were swallowed up by the pestilence, on the night when the Angel of the Lord went out to smite them, and, from the sleep of revelry, they slept the sleep from which they shall not awake until the Judgement Day. God chooseth the last moment of the triumph of the wicked, when he is flushed by his success, the last of the helplessness of the righteous, when his hope can be in the Lord Alone, to exchange their lots. The righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked cometh in his stead. Spiritually, "the false fullness of the rich of this world, is real leanness; the greenness of such grass (for all flesh is grass) is real dryness. <sup>4</sup> Those who explain this of the past, render, "Out of thee, Judah, is gone away, withdrawn, he who devised evil against the Lord." But a person is said to "go forth" out of that which is his abode, from the city, gate, &c. or, to war. In the exceptions, Is. xlix. 17, "thy destroyers and wasters shall go forth from thee," it is implied that they had long sojourned there, and were to give place to the children, who should return. In Jer. xliii. 12, where it is said of Nebuchadnezzar, he shall go forth thence in peace, it is first said, he shall set up his throne there and shall array himself with the land of Egypt, as a shepherd putteth on his garment; i. e. he shall make it wholly his own.

50. 8.

14 And the Lord hath given a command-is wonderful how much God says in few words; and how it is here foretold that, with no previous loss, a mighty host secure and at ease, in consequence of their prosperity, all are at one blow mown down, like the dry grass before the scythe, are cut off and perish; and one, their king, passeth away, first by flight, and then by destruction. As they had shorn the glory of others<sup>14</sup>, so should they be shorn and cut down themselves.

Though I have afflicted thee, I will afflict thee<sup>15</sup> no more, unless by new guilt thou compel Me. God always relieves us from trouble, as it were with the words<sup>16</sup>, sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee. In the end, afflictions shall be turned into joy, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, nor sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain<sup>17</sup>.

13. For now will I break his yoke from off thee. God, lest His own should despair, does not put them off altogether to a distant day, but saith, now. Historically, the beginning of the fall is the earnest of the end. By the destruction of Sennacherib, God declared His displeasure against Assyria; the rest was matter of time only. Thus Haman's wise men say to him, <sup>18</sup> If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast begun to fall, thou shalt not prevail against him, but shalt surely fall before him; as He saith in Isaiah, <sup>19</sup> I will break the Assyrian in My land, and upon My mountains tread him under foot; then shall his yoke depart from off them, and his burden depart from off their shoulders. <sup>20</sup> In that He saith, not 'I will loose,' 'will undo,' but 'I will break,' 'will burst,' He sheweth that He will in such wise free Jerusalem, as to pour out displeasure on the enemy. The very mode of speaking shews the greatness of His displeasure against those who, when for the secret purpose of His judgements they have power given them against the servants of God, feed themselves on their punishments, and moreover dare to boast against God, as did the Assyrian, <sup>21</sup> By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom."

14. And the Lord hath given a commandment concerning thee, O Assyrian. In the word "I have afflicted thee," the land of Israel is addressed, as usual in Hebrew, in the feminine; here, a change of gender in Hebrew shews the person ad-

of physical entireness, completeness, or mental integrity. In one place only, Gen. xxxiv. 21, אֶלֶּם אֶלֶּם is doubtless rendered rightly "peaceable with us," as אֶלֶּם Ps. vii. 5, but not in the frequent idiom אֶלֶּם אֶלֶּם, whether with or without אֶלֶּם, and never by itself.

<sup>10</sup> So it seems better to render it, than, as in the E. V., and he shall pass through. The word means alike "pass away" or "pass through," but the act spoken of is later than the cutting down of the army, and so probably the passing away, or flight of its king, to his destruction or final passing away. <sup>11</sup> Dan. ii. 24. <sup>12</sup> אֶלֶּם is used of sheep-shearing, cutting off the hair in sorrow; אֶלֶּם is "mown grass, fleece cut." Here alone, it is a metaphor, like that of אֶלֶּם, Is. vii. 30. <sup>13</sup> Comp. Ps. xlviii. 4. <sup>14</sup> Is. vii. 20.

<sup>15</sup> אֶלֶּם "afflicted" relatively to God, is said of His chastisement of His people (Deut. viii. 2. 2 Kgs. xvii. 20) or of individuals (Ps. lxxxviii. 8. xc. 18. cii. 24. cxxx. 75. Job xxx. 11.) but no where of the enemies of God, whose destruction imagery is here spoken of. It cannot then refer to the Assyrian, as some have done. The suitable opinion of the <sup>16</sup> in אֶלֶּם was probably for the rhythm.

dressed to be different. <sup>1</sup>By His command alone, and the word of His power, He cut off the race of the Assyrian, as he says in Wisdom, of Egypt, <sup>2</sup>Thine Almighty word leaped down from Heaven, out of Thy royal throne; as a fierce man of war into the midst of a land of destruction, and brought Thine unfeigned commandment as a sharp sword, and standing up filled all things with death, or else it may be, He gave command to the Angels His Ministers. God commandeth beforehand, that, when it cometh to pass, it may be known <sup>3</sup>that not by chance, nor by the will of man, nor without His judgement but by the sentence of God the blow came.

No more of thy name be sown, as Isaiah saith, <sup>4</sup>the seed of evil-doers shall never be renowned. He prophesies, not the immediate but the absolute cessation of the Assyrian line. If the prophecy was uttered at the time of Sennacherib's invasion, seventeen years before his death, not Esarhaddon only, but his son Assurbanipal also, whose career of personal conquest, the last glory of the house of the Sargonides and of the empire, began immediately upon his father's reign of thirteen years, was probably already born. Assurbanipal in this case would only have been thirty-one, at the beginning of his energetic reign, and would have died in his fifty-second year. After him followed only an inglorious twenty-two years. The prophet says, the Lord hath commanded. The decree as to Ahab's house was fulfilled in the person of his second son, as to Jeroboam and Baasha in their sons. It waited its appointed time, but was fulfilled in the complete excision of the doomed race.

Out of the house of thy gods will I cut off graven image and molten image<sup>5</sup>; as thou hast done to others<sup>6</sup>, it shall be done to thee. <sup>7</sup>And when even the common objects of worship of the Assyrian and Chaldean were not spared, what would be the ruin of the whole city! So little shall thy gods help thee, that <sup>8</sup>there shalt thou be punished, where thou hopest for aid. Graven and molten image shall be thy grave; amid altar and oblations, as thou worshippest idols, thanking them for thy deliverance, shall thy unholy blood be shed, as it was by his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer<sup>9</sup>. I will make it <sup>10</sup>thy grave; what God maketh remains immovable, cannot be changed. But He maketh thy grave in hell, where not only that rich man in the Gospel hath his grave; but all who are or have been like him, and especially thou, O Asshur, of whom it is written, <sup>11</sup>Asshur is there and all her company; his graves are about him: all of them slain, fallen by the sword. Whose graves are set in the sides of the pit and her company is round about her grave: all of them slain, fallen by the sword, which caused terror in the land of the living. Graven and molten image, the idols which men adore, the images of their vanity, the created things which they worship instead of the true God (as they whose god is their belly), in which they busy themselves in this life, shall be their destruction in the Day of Judgement.

For thou art vile. Thou honouredst thyself and dishonouredst God, so shalt thou be dishonoured<sup>12</sup>, as He saith, <sup>13</sup>Them that honour Me I will honour, and they that despise Me shall be lightly esteemed. So when he had said to Edom, <sup>14</sup>thou art greatly despised, he adds the ground of it, The pride of thine heart hath deceived thee. For thou art vile. Great, honoured, glorious as Assyria or its ruler were in the eyes of men, the prophet tells him, what he was in himself, being such in the eyes of God, light, empty, as Daniel said to Belshazzar, <sup>15</sup>Thou art weighed in the balances, and found wanting, of no account, vile.

15. Behold upon the mountains, the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace. From mountain-top to mountain-top by beacon-fires they spread the glad tidings. Suddenly the deliverance comes, sudden its announcement. Behold! Judah, before hindered by armies from going up to Jerusalem, its cities taken<sup>16</sup>, may now again keep the feasts there, and pay the vows, which "in trouble she promised;" for the wicked one, the ungodly Sennacherib, is utterly cut off, he shall no more pass through thee; "the army and king and empire of the Assyrians have perished." But the words of prophecy cannot be bound down to this. These large promises, which, as to this world, were forfeited in the next reign, when Manasseh was taken captive to Babylon, and still more in the seventy years' captivity, and more yet in that until now, look for a fulfilment, as they stand. They sound so absolute. "I will afflict thee no more," "the wicked shall no more pass through thee," "he is utterly (lit. the whole of him) cut off." Nahum joins on this signal complete deliverance from a temporal enemy, to the final deliverance of the people of God. The invasion of Sennacherib was an avowed conflict with God Himself. It was a defiance of God. He would make God's people, his; he would cut it off, that it be no more a people, and that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance<sup>17</sup>. There was a more "evil counsellor" behind, whose agent was Sennacherib. He, as he is the author of all murders and strife, so has he a special hatred for the Church, whether before or since Christ's Coming. Before, that he might cut off that Line from whom the Seed of the woman should be born, which should destroy his empire and crush himself, and that he might devour the Child who was to be born<sup>18</sup>. Since, because her members are his freed captives, and she makes inroads on his kingdom, and he hates them because he hates God and Christ Who dwells in them. As the time of the birth of our Lord neared, his hate became more concentrated. God overruled the hatred of Edom or Moab, or the pride of Assyria, to His own ends, to preserve Israel by chastising it. Their hatred was from the evil one, because it was God's people, the seed of Abraham, the tribe of Judah, the line of David. If they could be cut off, they of whom Christ was to be born according to the flesh, and so, in all seeming, the hope of the world, were gone. Sennacherib then was not a picture only, he was the agent of Satan, who used his hands, feet, tongue, to blaspheme God and war against His people. As then we have respect not to the mere agent, but to the principal, and should address him through those he employed (as Elisha said of the messenger who came to slay him, 'is not the sound of his master's feet behind him?'), so the Prophet's words chiefly and most fully go to the instigator of Sennacherib, whose very name he names, Belial. It is the deliverance of the Church and the people of God which he foretells, and thanks God for. To the Church he says in the Name of God, Though I have afflicted thee, I will afflict thee no more<sup>1</sup>. The yoke which He will burst is the yoke of the oppressor, of which Isaiah speaks, and which the Son, to be born of a Virgin, "the Mighty God, the Prince of Peace," was to break<sup>2</sup>; the yoke of sin and the bands of fleshly pleasure and evil habits, wherewith we were held captive, so that henceforth we should walk upright, unbowed, look up to heaven our home, and run the way of Thy commandments when Thou hast set my heart at liberty. Behold, then, upon the mountains, i. e. above all the height of this world, the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, i. e. of remission of sins and sanctification by the Spirit and the freedom and adoption as sons, and the casting out of the Prince of this world, that publisheth peace. O Judah, thou, the true people of God, keep thy solemn feasts, the substance of the figures of the law." "He who is ever engaged on the words deeds and thoughts of Him, Who is by nature Lord, the Word of God, ever liveth in His days, ever keepeth Lord's days. Yea he who ever prepareth himself for the true life and abstaineth from the sweets of this life which deceive the many, and who cherisheth not the mind of the flesh but chastens the body and enslaves it, is ever keeping the days of preparation. He too who thinketh that Christ our Passover was sacrificed for us, and that we must keep festival, eating the flesh of the Word, there is no time when he keepeth not the Passover, ever passing over in thought and every word and deed from the affairs of this life to God, and hastening to His city. Moreover whoso can say truthfully, we have risen together with Christ, yea and also, He hath together raised us and together seated us in the heavenly places in Christ, ever liveth in the days of Pentecost; and chiefly, when, going up into the upper room as the Apostles of Jesus, he giveth himself to supplication and prayer, that he may become meet for the rushing mighty wind from heaven, which mightily effaceth the evil in men and its fruits, meet too for some portion of the fiery tongue from God." "Such an one will keep the feast excellently, having the faith in Christ fixed, hallowed by the Spirit, glorious with the grace of adoption. And he will offer to God spiritual sacrifice, consecrating himself for an odour of sweetness, cultivating also every kind of virtue, temperance, continence, fortitude, endurance, charity, hope, love of the poor, goodness, longsuffering: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased. Every power of the enemy, which before had dominion over him, shall pass through no more, since Christ commanded the unclean spirits to depart into the abyss and giveth to those who love Him power to resist the enemy, and subdue the passions, and destroy sin and tread on serpents and scorpions and every power of the enemy."

And these feasts were to be kept "in the spirit not in the letter. For what availeth it to keep any feast without, unless there be the feast of contemplation in the soul?" Wherefore he adds, and pay thy vows, i. e. thyself, whom in Baptism thou hast vowed: for the Wicked One shall no more pass through thee. "For from what time, O Judah, Christ, by dying and rising again, hallowed thy feasts, he can no longer pass through thee. Thenceforth he perished wholly. Not that he has, in substance, ceased to be, but that the death of the human race, which through his envy came into this world, the two-fold death of body and soul, wholly perisheth. Where and when did this Belial perish? When died the death which he brought in, whence himself also is called Death? When Christ died, then died the death of our souls; and when Christ rose again, then perished the death of our bodies. When then, O Judah, thou keepest thy feasts, remember that thy very feast is He, of Whom thou sayest that by dying He conquered death and by rising He restored life. Hence it is said, Belial shall no more pass through thee. For if thou look to that alone, that Sennacherib departed, to return no more, and perished, it would not be true to say, Belial hath wholly perished! For after him many a Belial, such as he was, passed through thee, and hurt thee far more. Perchance thou sayest, 'so long as Nineveh standeth, how sayest thou, that Belial has wholly perished? So long as the world standeth, how shall I be comforted, that death hath perished? For lo! persecutors armed with death have stormed, and besides them, many sons of Belial, of whom Anti-Christ will be the worst. How then sayest thou, that Belial has wholly perished?' It follows, the Scatterer hath gone up before thee. To Judah in the flesh, Nebuchadnezzar who went up against Nineveh, was worse than Sennacherib. Who then is He Who went up before thee, and dispersed the world, that great Nineveh, that thou shouldest have full consolation? Christ Who descended, Himself ascended; and as He ascended, so shall He come to disperse Nineveh, i. e. to judge the world. What any persecutor doth meanwhile, yea or the Devil himself or Anti-Christ, taketh nothing from the truth, that Belial hath wholly perished. The prince of this world is cast out. For nothing which they do, or can do, hinders, that both deaths of body and soul are swallowed up in His victory, Who hath ascended to heaven? Belial cannot in the members kill the soul, which hath been made alive by the death of the Head, i. e. Christ; and as to the death of the body, so certain is it that it will perish, that thou mayest say fearlessly that it hath perished, since Christ the Head hath risen."

Each fall of an enemy of the Church, each recovery of a sinful soul being a part of this victory, the words may be applied to each. The Church or the soul are bidden to keep the feast and pay their vows, whatever in their trouble they promised to God. "It is said to souls, which confess the Lord, that the devil who, before, wasted thee and bowed thee with that most heavy yoke hath, in and with the idols which thou madest for thyself, perished; keep thy feasts and pay to God thy vows, singing with the Angels continually, for no more shall Belial pass through thee, of whom the Apostle too saith, What concord hath Christ with Belial? The words too, Behold upon the mountains the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace" belong, in a degree, to all preachers of the Gospel. "1 No one can preach peace, who is himself below and cleaveth to earthly things. For wars are for the good things of earth. If thou wouldest preach peace to thyself and thy neighbour, be raised above the earth and its goods, riches and glory. Ascend to the heavenly mountains, whence David also, lifting up his eyes, hoped that his help would come."

C. II. The Prophet, having foretold the destruction of Sennacherib, and in him how the enemy of Judah is wholly cut off, goes on to describe the destruction of Nineveh, and with it of his whole kingdom, and, under it, of Anti-Christ and Satan.

1. He that dasheth in pieces, rather, the Disperser<sup>2</sup>, the instrument of God, whereby He should break her in pieces like a potter's vessel, or should scatter her in all lands, is come up against thy face, O Nineveh, i. e. either, over against thee<sup>3</sup>, confronting her as it were, face to face, or directed against thee<sup>4</sup>. From the description of the peace of Judah, the Prophet turns suddenly to her oppressor, to whom, not to Judah, the rest of the prophecy is directed. Jacob and Israel are spoken of, not to<sup>5</sup>. The destroyer of Nineveh went up against the face of Nineveh, not in the presence of Judah and Jacob, who were far away and knew nothing of it. Keep the munition. While all in Judah is now peace, all in Nineveh is tumult. God Whom they had defied, saying that Hezekiah could not <sup>6</sup>turn away the face of one captain of the least of his servants, now bids them prepare to meet him whom He would send against them. Gird up thy loins now, like a man<sup>7</sup>. Thou who wouldest lay waste others, now, if thou canst, keep thyself. The strength of the words is the measure of the irony. They had challenged God; He in turn challenges them to put forth all their might.

Fence thy defences<sup>8</sup>, we might say. Their strong walls, high though they were, unassailable by any then known skill of besiegers, would not be secure.

The prophet uses a kindred and allusive word, that their protection needed to be itself protected; and this, by one continued watchfulness. Watch, he adds, the way: espy out<sup>9</sup> (as far as thou canst), the coming of the enemy; strengthen the loins, the seat of strength<sup>10</sup>. Elsewhere they are said to be girded up for any exertion. Fortify thy strength exceedingly. The expression is rare<sup>11</sup>: commonly it is said of some part of the human frame, knees, arms, or mind, or of man by God.

The same words are strong mockery to those who resist God, good counsel to those who trust in God. Keep the munition, for He Who keepeth thee will not sleep<sup>12</sup>; watch the way, by which the enemy may approach from afar, for Satan approach- eth, sometimes suddenly, sometimes very stealthily and subtly, transforming himself into an angel of light. "13 Watch also the way by which thou art to go, as it is said, 14 Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein; so that, having stood in many ways, we may come to that Way which saith, I am the Way." Then, 15 make thy loins strong, as the Saviour commandeth His disciples, Let your loins be girded about<sup>16</sup>, and the Apostle says, 17 Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth; for nothing so strengtheneth as the Truth. For Christ being the Truth, whoso with his whole heart hath believed in Christ, is strong against himself, and hath power over the loins, the seat of the passions. Then, since this warfare is hard, he adds, be strong, fortify thy power mightily; resist not listlessly, but vehemently; and that, in His strength Who hath strengthened our nature, taking it to Himself and uniting it with the Godhead. For without Him, strong though thou be, thou wilt avail nothing.

2. For the Lord hath turned away (rather restoreth) the excellency of Jacob, speaking of what should come, as already come. For Nineveh falls, because God restores His people, whom it had oppressed. The restoration of God's favour to His Church is the season of His punishment of their enemies; as, again, His displeasure against her enemies is a token of His favour to her. When Herod was smitten by God, 18 the word of God grew and multiplied. A long captivity was still before Judah, yet the destruction of the Assyrian was the earnest that every oppressing city should cease<sup>19</sup>.

The excellency of Jacob. The word, excellency, is used in a good or bad sense; bad, if man takes the excellency to himself; good, as given by God. This is decisive against a modern popular rendering; "20 has returned to the excellency of Jacob;" for Scripture knows of no excellency of Jacob, except God Himself or grace from God. Jacob, if separated from God or left by Him, has no excellency, to which God could return.

As the excellency of Israel. Both the ten and the two tribes had suffered by the Assyrian. The ten had been carried captive by Shalmanezar, the two had been harassed by Sennacherib. After the captivity of the ten tribes, the name Jacob is used of Judah only. It may be then, that the restoration of God's favour is promised to each separately. Or, 21 there may be an emphasis in the names themselves. Their forefather bore the name of Jacob in his troubled days of exile; that of Israel was given him on his return<sup>22</sup>. It would then mean, the afflicted people (Jacob) shall be restored to its utmost glory as Israel. The sense is the same.

single stones with a pick-axe<sup>1</sup>. The Assyrian sculptures shew, in the means employed against or in defence of their engines, how central a part of the siege they formed<sup>2</sup>. Seven of them are represented in one siege<sup>3</sup>. The "ram" is mentioned in Ezekiel as the well-known and ordinary instrument of a siege.

Thus v. 3. describes the attack; v. 4. the defence; the two first clauses of v. 5, the defence; the two last, the attack. This quick interchange only makes the whole more vivid.

"But what availeth it to build the house, unless the Lord build it? What helpeth it to shut the gates, which the Lord unbarreth?" On both sides is put forth the full strength of man; there seems a stand-still to see, what will be, and God brings to pass His own work in His own way.

6. The gates of the rivers shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved. All gives way in an instant at the will of God; the strife is hushed; no more is said of war and death; there is no more resistance or bloodshed; no sound except the wailing of the captives, the flight of those who can escape, while the conquerors empty it of the spoil, and then she is left a waste. The swelling of the river and the opening made by it may have given rise to the traditional account of Ctesias, although obviously exaggerated as to the destruction of the wall. The exaggerated character of that tradition is not inconsistent with, it rather implies, a basis of truth. It is inconceivable that it should have been thought, that walls, of the thickness which Ctesias had described, were overthrown by the swelling of any river, unless some such event as Ctesias relates, that the siege was ended by an entrance afforded to the enemy through some bursting-in of the river, had been true. Nahum speaks nothing of the wall, but simply of the opening of the gates of the rivers, obviously the gates, by which the inhabitants could have access to the rivers<sup>4</sup>, which otherwise would be useless to them except as a wall. These rivers correspond to the rivers, the artificial divisions of the Nile, by which No or Thebes was defended, or the rivers of Babylon which yet was washed by the one stream, the Euphrates. But Nineveh was surrounded and guarded by actual rivers, the Tigris and the Khausser, and, (assuming those larger dimensions of Nineveh, which are supported by evidences so various<sup>5</sup>) the greater Zab, which was "called the frantic Zab" on account of the violence of its current." contained (says Ainsworth<sup>10</sup>), when we saw it, a larger body who worked the implement;—some appear to have been stationary, others in early times had six wheels, in the later times four only. Sometimes with the ram and its framework was a moveable tower, containing soldiers, who, at once, fought the enemy on a level and protected the engine."

<sup>1</sup> "Fire was the weapon usually turned against the ram, torches, burning tow or other inflammable substances being cast from the walls upon its framework." To prevent this [its being set on fire], the workers of the ram were sometimes provided with a supply of water; sometimes they suspended from a pole in front of their engine, a curtain of leather, or some other non-inflammable substance. In a bas-relief (Layard's Monuments, Series ii. Pl. 31.) where an enormous number of torches are seen in the air, every battering-ram is so protected. Or the besieged sought to catch the point of the ram by a chain, drawing it upwards; the besieger with metal hooks to keep it down." from Rawl. Ib. pp. 79, 80, referring further to Layard's Monuments, Series i. Pl. 17, 19. <sup>2</sup> Ib. p. 79. <sup>3</sup> Esek. iv. 2. <sup>4</sup> S. Jer.

of water than the Tigris, whose tributaries are not supplied by so many snow-mountains as those of the Zab." Of these, if the Tigris be now on a level lower than the ruins of Nineveh, it may not have been so formerly. The Khausser, in its natural direction, ran through Nineveh where, now as of old, it turns a mill, and must, of necessity, have been fenced by gates; else any invader might enter at will; as, in modern times, Mosul has its "gate of the bridge." A break in these would obviously let in an enemy, and might the more paralyze the inhabitants, if they had any tradition, that the river alone could or would be their enemy, as Nahum himself prophesied. Subsequently inaccuracy or exaggeration might easily represent this to be an overthrow of the walls themselves. It was all one, in which way the breach was made.

The palace shall be dissolved. The prophet unites the beginning and the end. The river-gates were opened; what had been the fence against the enemy became an entrance for them: with the river, there poured in also the tide of the people of the enemy. The palace, then, the imperial abode, the centre of the empire, embellished with the history of its triumphs, sank, was dissolved<sup>11</sup>, and ceased to be. It is not a physical loosening of the sun-dried bricks by the stream which would usually flow harmless by; but the dissolution of the empire itself. "The temple i. e. his kingdom was destroyed." The palaces both of Khorsabad and Kouyunjik lay near the Khausser<sup>12</sup> and both bear the marks of fire<sup>13</sup>.

7. The first word should be rendered, And it is decreed; She shall be laid bare. It is decreed<sup>14</sup>. All this took place, otherwise than man would have thought, because it was the will of God. She (the people of the city, under the figure of a captive woman) shall be laid bare<sup>15</sup>, in shame, to her reproach; she shall be brought up<sup>16</sup>, to judgement, or from Nineveh as being now sunk low and depressed; and her maids, the lesser cities, as female attendants on the royal city, and their inhabitants represented as women, both as put to shame and for weakness. The whole empire of Nineveh was overthrown by Nebopalassar. Yet neither was the special shame wanting, that the noble matrons and virgins were so led captives in shame and sorrow. They shall lead her, as with the voice of doves, moaning, yet, for fear, with a subdued voice.

8. But Nineveh is of old like a pool of water i. e. of many

Am. ix. 13. <sup>12</sup> See above Introd. to Jonah p. 255. Ashurbanipal, the last great monarch of Assyria, built his palace on the mound of Kouyunjik. (Rawl. 5 Emp. ii. 496). "The Khosr-un, which runs on this side of the Khorsabad ruins, often overflows its banks, and pours its waters against the palace-mound. The gates N. and S. of the mound may have been caused by its violence." Ib. i. 358. <sup>13</sup> See ab. p. 263 n. a.

<sup>14</sup> This is the simple rendering of נִדְּבָה, Hof. of 230. In Ch. 27, "firm," Dan. vi. 13; "reliable," Dan. ii. 45, vii. 16; נִדְּבָה "certainly," Dan. iii. 24, 27, p. "of a certainty," Dan. ii. 8. Also in Phoen.; Ges. Thes. p. 66. The retention of Huzzab as a proper name for the queen, is derived from R. Samuel Hannagid in Ibn Ezra. The ground for this, alleged in Rashi, viz. the use of נִדְּבָה Ps. xlv. 10, betrays its origin. Kimchi, with the same etymology, explains it of the palace.

<sup>15</sup> The meaning of נִדְּבָה (Ez.) is determined by that of the active נִדְּבָה, which is always "laid bare," not "carried captive." <sup>16</sup> As in c. iii. 2. Is. xlvii. 2, 3.

It was full not of citizens only, but of other nations poured into it. An old historian says<sup>4</sup>, "The chief and most powerful of those whom Ninus settled there, were the Assyrians, but also, of other nations, whoever willed." Thus the pool was filled; but at the rebuke of the Lord they flee. Stand, stand, the Prophet speaks in the name of the widowed city; "shut the gates, go up on the walls, resist the enemy, gather yourselves together, form a band to withstand," but none shall look back to the mother-city which calls them; all is forgotten, except their fear; parents, wives, children, the wealth which is plundered, home, worldly repute. So will men leave all things, for the life of this world. All that a man hath, will he give for his life. Why not for the life to come?

9. Take ye the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold. Nineveh had not hearkened of old to the voice of the Prophet, but had turned back to sin; it cannot hearken now, for fear. He turns to the spoiler to whom God's judgements assigned her, and who is too ready to hear. The gold and silver, which the last Assyrian king had gathered into the palace which he fired, was mostly removed (the story says, treacherously) to Babylon. Arbaces is said to have borne this and to have removed the residue, to the amount of many talents, to Agbatana, the Median capital<sup>5</sup>. For there is none end of the store. Nineveh had stored up from her foundation until then, but at last for the spoiler. When thou shalt cease to spoil, thou shalt be spoiled. Her "glory" was but a "weight" to weigh her down, that she should not rise again<sup>8</sup>. Their wealth brought on the day of calamity, availed not therein, although it could not be drawn dry even by the spoiler. <sup>9</sup>They could not spoil so much as she supplied to be spoiled.

10. She is empty and void and waste. The completeness of her judgement is declared first under that solemn number, and the feedingplace of the young lions, where the lion even the old lion, walked, and the lion's whelp, and none made them afraid?

12 The lion did tear in pieces enough for his whelps, and strangled for his lionesses, and filled his holes with prey, and his dens with ravin.

Three, and the three words in Hebrew are nearly the same<sup>12</sup>, with the same meaning, only each word fuller than the former, as picturing a growing desolation; and then under four heads (in all seven) also a growing fear. First the heart, the seat of courage and resolve and high purpose, melteth; then the knees smite together, tremble, shake, under the frame; then, much pain is in all loins, lit. "strong pains as of a woman in travail" writhing and doubling the whole body, and making it wholly powerless and unable to stand upright, shall bow the very loins, the seat of strength<sup>13</sup>, and, lastly, the faces of them all gather blackness<sup>14</sup>, the fruit of extreme pain, and the token of approaching dissolution.

11. Where is the dwelling of the lions, and the feedingplace of the young lions? Great indeed must be the desolation, which should call forth the wonder of the prophet of God. He asks "where is it?" For so utterly was Nineveh to be effaced, that its place should scarcely be known, and now is known by the ruins which have been buried, and are dug up. The messengers of her king had asked, <sup>15</sup>Where are the gods of Hamath and of Arpad? of Sepharvaim, Hena, and Ivah? And now of her it is asked, "Where is Nineveh?" It had destroyed utterly all lands, and now itself is utterly destroyed. The lion dwelt, fed, walked there, up and down, at will; all was spacious and secure; he terrified all, and none terrified him; he tore, strangled, laid up, as he willed, booty in store; but when he had filled it to the full, he filled up also the measure of his iniquities, and his sentence came from God. Nineveh had set at nought all human power, and destroyed it; now, therefore, God appeareth in His own Person.

13. Behold I, Myself, am against thee [lit. toward thee]. God, in His long-suffering, had, as it were, looked away from him; now He looked towards<sup>16</sup> him, and in His sight what wicked one should stand? Saith the LORD of hosts, Whose power is infinite and He changeth not, and all the armies of heaven, the holy angels and evil spirits and men are in His Hand, whereto He directs or overrules them. And I will burn her chariots in the smoke. The Assyrian sculptures attest how greatly their pride and strength lay in their chariots. They exhibit the minute embellishment of the chariots and horses<sup>17</sup>. Almost inconceivably light for speed, they are pictured as whirled onward by the two<sup>18</sup> or, more often, three<sup>19</sup> powerful steeds with eye of fire<sup>20</sup>, the bodies of the slain<sup>21</sup> (or, in peace, the lion<sup>22</sup>) under their feet, the mailed warriors, with bows stretched to the utmost, shooting at the more distant foe. Sennacherib gives a terrific picture of the fierceness of their onslaught. "The armour, the arms, taken in my attacks, swam in the blood of my enemies as in a river; the war-chariots, which destroy man and beast, had, in their course, crushed the bloody bodies and limbs<sup>1</sup>." All this their warlike pride should be but fuel for fire, and vanish in smoke, an emblem of pride, swelling, mounting like a column towards heaven, disappearing. Not a brand shall then be saved out of the burning; nothing half-consumed; but the fire shall burn, until there be nothing left to consume, as, in Sodom and Gomorrah<sup>2</sup>, the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of a furnace. And the sword of the vengeance of God shall devour the young lions, his hope for the time to come, the flower of his youth; and I will cut off thy prey, what thou hast robbed, and so that thou shouldst rob no more, but that thy spoil should utterly cease from the earth, and the voice of thy messengers shall be no more heard, such as Rabshakeh, whereby they insulted and terrified the nations and blasphemed God.

In the spiritual sense, Nineveh being an image of the world, the prophecy speaks of the inroad made upon it through the Gospel, its resistance, capture, desolation, destruction. First, He that ruleth with a rod of iron, came and denounced woe to it because of offences; then His mighty ones<sup>3</sup> in His Name. Their shield is red, the shield of faith, kindled and glowing with love. Their raiment too is red, because they wash it in the Blood of the Lamb, and conquer through the Blood of the Lamb, and many shed their own blood for a witness to them. The day of His preparation is the whole period, until the end of the world, in which the Gospel is preached, of which the prophets and apostles speak, as the day of salvation<sup>4</sup>; to the believing world a day of salvation; to the unbelieving, of preparation for judgement. All which is done, judgements, mercy, preaching, miracles, patience of the saints, martyrdom, all which is spoken, done, suffered, is part of the one preparation for the final judgement. The chariots, flashing with light as they pass, are the chariots of salvation, bearing the brightness of the doctrine of Christ and the glory of His truth throughout the world, enlightening while they wound; the "spears" are the word of God, slaying to make alive.

On the other hand, in resisting, the world clashes with itself. It would oppose the Gospel, yet knows not how; is "maddened with rage, and gnashes its teeth, that it can prevail nothing<sup>5</sup>." On the broad ways which lead to death, where Wisdom uttereth her voice and is not heard, it is hemmed in, and cannot find a straight path; its chariots dash one against another, and yet they breathe their ancient fury, and run to and fro like lightning, as the Lord saith, I beheld Satan, as lightning, fall from Heaven<sup>6</sup>. Then shall they remember their mighty ones, all the might of this world which they ascribed to their gods, their manifold triumphs, whereby in Heathen times their empire was established; they shall gather strength against strength, but it shall be powerless and real weakness. While they prepare for a long siege, without hand their gates give way; the kingdom falls, the world is taken captive by a blessed captivity, suddenly, unawares, as one says in the second century; "Men cry out that the state is beset, that the Christians are in their fields, in their forts, in their islands!" These mourn over their past sins, and beat their breasts, in token of their sorrow; yet sweeter shall be the plaint of their sorrow, than any past joy. So they shall mourn as doves, and their mourning is as melody and the voice of praise in the ear of the Most High. One part of the inhabitants of the world being thus blessedly taken, the rest are fled. So in all nearness of God's judgements, those who are not brought nearer, flee further. "They flee, and look not back, and none heareth the Lord speaking, Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings<sup>7</sup>. So then, hearing not His Voice, stand, stand, they flee away from His Presence in Mercy, into darkness for ever. Such is the lot of the inhabitants of the world; and what is the world itself? The prophet answers what it has been. A pool of water, into which all things, the riches and glory, and wisdom, and pleasures of this world, have flowed in on all sides, and which gave back nothing. All ended in itself. The water came from above, and became stagnant in the lowest part of the earth. "For all the wisdom of this world, apart from the sealed fountain of the Church, and of which it cannot be said, the streams thereof make glad the city of God nor are of those waters which, above the heavens, praise the Name of the Lord, however large they may seem, yet are little, and are enclosed in a narrow bound." These either are hallowed to God, like the spoils of Egypt, as when the eloquence of S. Cyprian was won through the fishermen<sup>8</sup>, or the gold and silver are offered to Him, or they are left to be wasted and burned up. All which is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, all under the sun, remain here. "If they are thine, take them with thee. When he dieth, he shall carry nothing away, his glory shall not descend after him<sup>9</sup>. True riches are, not wealth, but virtues, which the conscience carries with it, that it may be rich for ever." The seven-fold terrors<sup>10</sup>, singly, may have a good sense<sup>6</sup>, that the stony heart shall be melted, and the stiff knees, which before were not bent to God, be bowed in the Name of Jesus. Yet more fully are they the deepening horrors of the wicked in the Day of Judgement, when men's hearts shall fail them for fear and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth<sup>11</sup>, closing with the everlasting confusion of face, the shame and everlasting contempt, to which the wicked shall rise. As the vessel over the fire is not cleansed, but blackened, so through the judgements of God, whereby the righteous are cleansed, the wicked gather but fresh defilement and hate. Lastly, the Prophet asks, Where is the dwelling of those who had made the world a den of ravin, where the lion, even the devil who is a roaring lion, and all Anti-Christ<sup>12</sup>, destroyed at will; where Satan made his dwelling in the hearts of the worldly, and tore in pieces for his whelps, i. e. slew souls of men and gave them over to inferior evil spirits to be tormented, and filled his holes with prey, the pit of hell with the souls which he deceived<sup>13</sup>? The question implies that they shall not be. "They which have seen him shall say, Where is he? God Himself answers, that He Himself will come against it to judgement, and destroy all might arrayed against God; and Christ shall smite the Wicked one with the rod of His Mouth, and the sharp two-edged sword out of His mouth shall smite all nations, and the smoke of their

CHAPTER III.

1 The miserable ruin of Nineveh.

† Heb. city of bloods.

* Ezek. 33. 2,
5. & 24. 6, 9.
Hab. 2. 13.

† Jer. 47. 3.

WOE to the † * bloody city! it is all full of lies and robbery; the prey departeth not;

2 The noise of a whip, and<sup>b</sup> the noise of the rattling of the wheels, and of the torment ascendeth up for ever and ever<sup>1</sup>; and it should no more oppress, nor "any messenger of Satan" go forth to harass the saints of God.

C. III. The prophecy of the destruction in Nineveh is resumed in a dirge over her; yet still as future. It pronounces a woe, yet to come<sup>2</sup>.

1. Woe to the bloody city, lit. city of bloods<sup>3</sup>, i. e. of manifold bloodshedding, built and founded in blood<sup>4</sup>, as the prosperity of the world ever is. Murder, oppression, wresting of judgement, war out of covetousness, grinding or neglect of the poor, make it a city of bloods. Nineveh, or the world, is a city of the devil, as opposed to the "city of God." "Two sorts of love have made two sorts of cities; the earthly, love of self even to contempt of God; the Heavenly, love of God even to contempt of self. The one glorieth in itself, the other in the Lord." "Amid the manifold differences of the human race, in languages, habits, rites, arms, dress, there are but two kinds of human society, which, according to our Scriptures, we may call two cities. One is of such as wish to live according to the flesh; the other of such as will according to the Spirit."
"Of these, one is predestined to live for ever with God; the other, to undergo everlasting torment with the devil." Of this city, or evil world, Nineveh, the city of bloods, is the type.

It is all full of lies and robbery, better, it is all lie; it is full of robbery [rapine]. Lie includes all falsehood, in word or act, denial of God, hypocrisy; towards man, it speaks of treachery, treacherous dealing, in contrast with open violence or rapine<sup>5</sup>.
The whole being of the wicked is one lie, towards God and man; deceiving and deceived; leaving no place for God Who is the Truth; seeking through falsehood things which fail.
Man <sup>6</sup> loveth vanity and seeketh after leasing. All were gone out of the way. "There were none in so great a multitude, for whose sake the mercy of God might spare so great a city."
It is full, not so much of booty as of rapine and violence.
The sin remains, when the profit is gone. Yet it ceaseth not, but persevereth to the end; the prey departeth<sup>10</sup> not; they will neither leave the sin, nor the sin them; they neither repent, nor are weary of sinning. Avarice especially gains vigour in old age, and grows by being fed. The prey departeth not, but continues as a witness against it, as a lion's lair is defiled by the fragments of his prey.

2. The noise [lit. voice] of the whip. There is cry against cry;

word itself. It is used of classes of persons 25 times; against people, Samaria, Jerusalem or foreign nations, 18 times; of the past only as to the wallings at funerals. 1 Kgs.
xiii. 20, Jer. xlii. 18, xxiv. 5. <sup>3</sup> As in E. M. The phrase occurs Ezek. xxii. 2, xxiv.
6, 9. So <sup>4</sup> woe, woe, woe, "a man" (3 Sam. xvi. 7, 8. Ps. v. 7) "men" (Ps. xvi. 9, lv. 24, lix. 3, cxxxix. 19, Pr. xxix. 10) "a house" (3 Sam. xxi. 1) "of bloods," guilty of mani-
<sup>8</sup> Ps. lxxv. The verb is used of the merciless "tearing" of the lion, "rending and

<sup>13</sup> woe of the chariots, Jer. xlii. 3, of the warhorse, Job xxxix. 24, of the loud tumult of battle, Is. ix. 4, Jer. x. 22.

1 Chr. xv. 29, of the satyr, Is. xlii. 21. Even when used of the trembling of the mountains before God, they are compared to living things, a calf, Ps. xxix. 6, rams,

Before
cir. 718.

3 The horseman lifteth up both † the† bright sword and the glittering spear:
and there is a multitude of slain, and a great number of carcases; and there is none end of their corpses; they stumble upon their corpses:

† Heb. the flame of the

the voice of the enemy, brought upon them through the voice of the oppressed. Blood hath a voice which crieth<sup>11</sup> to heaven; its echo or counterpart, as it were, is the cry of the destroyer.
All is urged on with terrific speed. The chariot-wheels quiver<sup>12</sup> in the rapid onset; the chariots bound, like living things<sup>13</sup>; the earth echoes with the whirling swiftness<sup>14</sup> of the speed of the cavalry. The Prophet within, with the inward ear and eye which heareth the mysteries of the Kingdom of God<sup>15</sup> and seeth things to come, as they shall come upon the wicked, sees and hears the scourge coming, with<sup>16</sup> a great noise, impetuously; and so describes it as present. Wars and rumours of wars are among the signs of the Day of Judgement. The scourge, though literally relating to the vehement onset of the enemy, suggests to the thoughts, the scourges of Almighty God, wherewith He chastens the penitent, punishes the impenitent; the wheel, the swift changes of man's condition in the rolling-on of time.

<sup>17</sup> O God, make them like a rolling thing.

3. The horseman lifteth up, rather, leading up<sup>18</sup>: the flash of the sword, and the lightning of the spear. Thus there are, in all, seven inroads, seven signs, before the complete destruction of Nineveh or the world; as, in the Revelations, all the forerunners of the Judgement of the Great Day are summed up under the voice of seven trumpets<sup>19</sup> and seven vials. "God shall not use horses and chariots and other instruments of war, such as are here spoken of, to judge the world, yet, as is just, His terrors are foretold under the name of those things, wherewith this proud and bloody world hath sinned. For so all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword<sup>21</sup>."
They who, abusing their power, have used all these weapons of war, especially against the servants of God, shall themselves perish by them, and there shall be none end of their corpses, for they shall be corpses for ever: for, dying by an everlasting death, they shall, without end, be without the true life, which is God." And there is a multitude of slain. Death follows on death. The Prophet views the vast field of carnage, and every where there meets him only some new form of death, slain, carcases, corpses, and these in multitudes, an oppressive heavy number, without end, so that the yet living stumble and fall upon the carcases of the slain. So great the multitude of those who perish, and such their foulness; but what foulness is like sin!

Ps. cxlv. 4, 6. It is used also of the locusts Jo. ii. 5. [all]. Mostly, as here, it is in-transitive. In Syr. Pa. is "danced;" in Arabic the insulated <sup>22</sup> is used of "boasting as a kid." See Laine a. v.

<sup>14</sup> The root only occurs besides Jud. v. 22. "Then smote [the earth] the horse-hoofs from the whirling, the whirling [probably "whirling speed" wrl. q. w] of his mighty upon [i. e.
steeds. Jer. vii. 36, xlvii. 3. l. 11. j.] <sup>15</sup> E. M. xxi. 12-16.

words stand very broken, mostly in pairs, describing, as it were, by the very order of the words; the successive onsets, wherewith the destruction from God should break in upon them.

4 Because of the multitude of the whoredoms of the wellfavoured harlot, the mistress of witchcrafts, that selleth nations through her whoredoms, and families through her witchcrafts.

Isa. 47. 9, 12.
Rev. 18. 2, 8.

4. Because of the multitude of the whoredoms of the wellfavoured harlot. There are multitudes of slain, because of the multitude of whoredoms and love of the creature instead of the Creator. So to Babylon Isaiah saith, "they [loss of children and widowhood] shall come upon thee in their perfection for the multitude of thy sorceries, for the great abundance of thine enchantments." The actual use of enchantments, for which Babylon was so infamous, is not elsewhere attributed to the Assyrians. But neither is the word elsewhere used figuratively; nor is Assyria, in its intimate relation to Babylon, likely to have been free from the longing, universal in Heathendom, to obtain knowledge as to the issue of events which would affect her. She is, by a rare idiom, entitled "mistress" of enchantments, having them at her command, as instruments of power. Mostly, idolatries and estrangement from God are spoken of as whoredoms, only in respect of those who, having been taken by God as His own, forsook Him for false gods. But Jezebel too, of whose offences Jehu speaks under the same two titles<sup>1</sup>, was a heathen. And such sins were but part of that larger all-comprehending sin, that man, being made by God for Himself, when he loveth the creature instead of the Creator, divorceth himself from God. Of this sin world-empires, such as Nineveh, were the concentration. Their being was one vast idolatry of self and of the god of this world. All, art, fraud, deceit, protection of the weak against the strong<sup>2</sup>, promises of good<sup>3</sup>, were employed, together with open violence, to absorb all nations into it. The one end of all was to form one great idol-temple, of which the centre and end was man, a rival worship to God, which should enslave all to itself and the things of this world. Nineveh and all conquering nations used fraud as well as force, enticed and entangled others, and so sold and deprived them of freedom<sup>4</sup>. Nor are people less sold and enslaved, because they have no visible master. False freedom is the deepest and most abject slavery. All sinful nations or persons extend to others the infection of their own sins. But, chiefly, the "wicked world," manifoldly arrayed with fair forms, and "beautiful in the eyes of those who will not think or weigh how much more beautiful the Lord and Creator of all," spreads her enticements on all sides, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, "her pomps and vanities," worldly happiness and glory and majesty, and ease and abundance; deceives and sells mankind into the power of Satan. It is called well-favoured [lit. good of grace], because the world has a real beauty, nor, "unless there were a grace and beauty in the things we love, could they draw us to them." They have their beauty, because from God; then are they deformed, when "things hold us back from God, which, unless they were in God, were not at all." We deform them, if we love them for our own sakes, not in Him; or for the intimations they give of Him. "Praise as to things foul has an intensity of blame. As if one would speak of a skilled thief, or a courageous robber, or a clever cheat. So though he calls Nineveh a well-favoured harlot, this will not be for her praise, (far from it!) but conveys the heavier condemnation. As they, when they would attract, use dainty babblings, so was Nineveh a skilled artificer of ill-doing, well provided with means to capture cities and lands and to persuade them what pleased herself." She selleth not nations only but families, drawing mankind both as a mass, and one by one after her, so that scarce any escape.

The adultery of the soul from God is the more grievous, the nearer God has brought any to Himself, in priests worse than in the people, in Christians than in Jews, in Jews than in Heathen; yet God espoused mankind to Him when He made him. His dowry were gifts of nature. If this be adultery, how much sorer, when betrothed by the Blood of Christ, and endowed with the gift of the Spirit!

5. Behold I am against thee, saith the Lord of Hosts. "I will not send an Angel, nor give thy destruction to others; I Myself will come to destroy thee." "She has not to do with man, or war with man: He Who is angered with her is the Lord of hosts. But who would meet God Almighty, Who hath power over all, if He would war against him?" In the Medes and Persians it was God who was against them. Behold I am against thee, lit. towards thee. It is a new thing which God was about to do. Behold! God in His long-suffering had seemed to overlook her. Now, He says, I am towards thee, looking at her with His all-searching eye, as her Judge. Violence is punished by suffering; deeds of shame by shame. All sin is a whited sepulchre, fair without, foul within. God will strip off the outward fairness, and lay bare the inward foulness. The deepest shame is to lay bare, what the sinner or the world veiled within. I will discover thy skirts<sup>5</sup>, i. e. the long flowing robes which were part of her pomp and dignity, but which were only the veil of her misdeeds. Through the greatness of thine iniquity have thy skirts been discovered, says Jeremiah in answer to the heart's question, why have these things come upon me? Upon thy face, where shame is felt. The conscience of thy foulness shall be laid bare before thy face, thy eyes, thy memory continually, so that thou shalt be forced to read therein, whatsoever thou hast done, said, thought. I will shew the nations thy nakedness, that all may despise, avoid, take example by thee, and praise God for His righteous judgements upon thee. The Evangelist heard much people it is not expressed to whom they were sold. But here the nations were not, as nations, sold by Assyria into the hands of others, but retained in its own power. Yet since to occurs 80 times throughout the O. T. in the one sense "sell" and its derivatives to, to, to, 14 times, it is against all idiom to assume that, in this one case, it meant "deceived" (as the Arab. to with acc. p. and 3 of thg.); nor were the enchantments an instrument of deceit; the word then must here too retain its sense of depriving of liberty, "selling" to slavery or death.

<sup>2</sup> to (always plural) are spoken of as to Jezebel, 2 Kgs. ix. 23; Babylon, Isa. l. c. and as to be abolished by God in Judah, Micah v. 11. Those who used them, to, were employed by Pharaoh, Ex. vii. 11, and Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. ii. 2; were strictly forbidden to Israel (Ex. xxii. 17, De. xviii. 10); their employment was one chief offence of Mithras. (3 Chr. xxviii. 6.)
<sup>3</sup> to (fam.) only occurs amidst in 2 Kgs. xvii. 17, of the widow of Zarephath, who, as being a widow, was the mistress of the house, and of the which of Endor, as the wife of Saul, xxviii. 7.

6 And I will cast abominable filth upon thee, and 'make thee vile, and will set thee as <sup>a</sup> a gazingstock.

7 And it shall come to pass that all they that look upon thee 'shall flee from thee, and say, Nineveh is laid waste: <sup>k</sup> who will in heaven saying Alleluia to God that He hath judged the whore which did corrupt the earth with her fornication<sup>1</sup>. And Isaiah saith, They shall go forth and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against Me<sup>2</sup>.

6. And I will cast abominable filth upon thee, "like a weight, that what thou wouldest not take heed to as sin, thou mayest feel in punishment." Abominable things had God seen<sup>4</sup> in her doings; with abominable things would He punish her. Man would fain sin, and forget it as a thing past. God maketh him to possess the iniquities of his youth<sup>5</sup>, and blindeth them around him, so that they make him to appear what they are, vile<sup>6</sup>. <sup>7</sup> These things hast thou done and I kept silence;—I will reprove thee and set them in order before thine eyes. And will set thee as a gazing-stock, that all, while they gaze at thee, take warning from thee<sup>8</sup>. <sup>9</sup> I will cast thee to the ground; before kings will I give thee, for them to gaze upon thee. "Whoso amendeth not on occasion of others, others shall be amended on occasion of him."

7. All they that look upon thee shall flee from thee through terror, lest they should share her plagues, as Israel did, when the earth swallowed up Corah, Dathan and Abiram; and they who <sup>11</sup> had been made rich by Babylon, stand afar off, for the fear of her torment. All they who look on thee. She was set as a thing to be gazed at<sup>12</sup>. He tells the effect on the gazers. Each one who so gazed<sup>13</sup> at her should flee; one by one, they should gaze, be scared, flee<sup>14</sup>. Not one should remain. Who will bemoan her? Not one should pay her the passing tribute of sympathy at human calamity, the shaking of the head at her woe<sup>15</sup>. Who had no compassion, shall find none.

8. Art thou better<sup>16</sup>, more populous or more powerful, than the populous No? rather than No-Amon, so called from the idol Ammon, worshipped there. No-Amon, (or, as it is decyphered in the Cuneiform Inscriptions, Nia), meaning probably "the portion of Ammon"<sup>17</sup>, was the sacred name of the capital of Upper Egypt, which, under its common name, Thebes, was far-famed, even in the time of Homer, for its continually accruing wealth, its military power, its 20,000 chariots, its vast dimensions attested by its 100 gates<sup>18</sup>. Existing earlier, as the capital of Upper Egypt, its grandeur began in the 18th dynasty, after the expulsion of the Hyksos, or Semitic conquerors of Egypt. Its Pharaohs were conquerors, during the 18th-20th dynasties, B. C. 1706-1110, about six centuries. It was then the centre of a world-empire. Under a disguised name<sup>19</sup>, its rulers were celebrated in Greek story also, for their world-wide conquests. The Greek statements have in some main points been verified by the decyphering of the hieroglyphics. The monuments relate their victories in far

Asia, and mention Nineveh itself among the people who paid tribute to them. They warred and conquered from the Soudan to Mesopotamia. A monument of Tothmosis I. (1066 B. C.) still exists at Kerman, between the 20th and 19th degrees latitude, boasting, in language like that of the Assyrian conquerors; "All lands are subdued, and bring their tributes for the first time to the gracious god<sup>20</sup>." "The frontier of of Egypt," they say<sup>21</sup>, "extends Southward to the mountain of Aptâ (in Abyssinia) and Northward to the furthest dwellings of the Asiatics." The hyperbolic statements are too undefined for history<sup>22</sup>, but widely-conquering monarchs could alone have used them. "At all periods of history, the possession of the country which we call Soudan (the Black country) comprising Nubia, and which the ancients called by the collective name of Kous [Cush] or Æthiopia, has been an exhaustless source of wealth to Egypt. Whether by way of war or of commerce, barks laden with flocks, corn, hides, ivory, precious woods stones and metals, and many other products of those regions, descended the Nile into Egypt, to fill the treasures of the temples and of the court of the Pharaohs: and of metals, especially gold, mines whereof were worked by captives and slaves, whose Egyptian name noub seems to have been the origin of the name Nubia, the first province S. of Egypt." "The conquered country of Soudan, called Kous in the hieroglyphic inscriptions, was governed by Egyptian princes of the royal family, who bore the name of 'prince royal of Kous.'"

But the prophet's appeal to Nineveh is the more striking, because No, in its situation, its commerce, the sources of its wealth, its relation to the country which lay between them, had been another and earlier Nineveh. Only, as No had formerly conquered and exacted tribute from all those nations, even to Nineveh itself, so now, under Sargon and Sennacherib, Nineveh had reversed all those successes, and displaced the empire of Egypt by its own, and taken No itself. No had, under its Tothmoses, Amenophes, Sethos, the Ousertesens, sent its messengers<sup>24</sup>, the leviers of its tribute, had brought off from Asia that countless mass of human strength, the captives, who (as Israel, before its deliverance, accomplished its hard labours) completed those gigantic works, which, even after 2000 years of decay, are still the marvel of the civilized world. Tothmosis I., after subduing the Sasou, brought back countless captives from Naharina<sup>25</sup> (Mesopotamia); Tothmosis III., in 19 years of conquests, (1603-1585 B. C.) "raised the Egyptian empire to the height of its greatness. Tothmosis repeatedly attacked the most powerful people of Asia, as the Routen (Assyrians?) with a number of subordinate kingdoms, such as Asshur, Babel, Nineveh, Singar; such as the Remenen or Armenians, the Zahi or Phœnicians, the Cheta or Hittites, and many more. We learn, by the description of the objects of the booty, sent to Egypt by land and sea, counted by number and weight, many curious details as to the industry of the conquered peoples of central Asia, which do honour to the civilisation of that time, and verify the tradition that the Egyptian kings set up stelæ in conquered countries, in memory of their victories. Tothmosis III. set up his stele in Mesopotamia, 'for having enlarged the frontiers of Egypt.' Amenophis too is related to have 'taken the fortress of Nenii (Nineveh).' 'He returned from the country of the higher Routen, where he had beaten all his enemies to enlarge the frontiers of the land of Egypt.' 'He took possession of the people of the South, and chastised the people of the North: "at Abd-el-Kournah" he was represented as "having for his foot-stool the heads and backs of five peoples of the S. and four peoples of the N. or Asiatics." "Among the names of the peoples, who submitted to Egypt, are the Nubians, the Asiatic shepherds, the inhabitants of Cyprus and Mesopotamia." "The world in its length and its breadth" is promised by the sphinx to Tothmosis IV. He is represented as "subduer of the negroes." Under Amenophis III., the Memnon of the Greeks, "the Egyptian empire extended Northward to Mesopotamia, Southward to the land of Karou." He enlarged and beautified No, which had from him the temple of Louksor, and his vocal statue, "all people bringing their tributes, their children, their horses, a mass of silver, of iron and ivory from countries, the roads whereto we know not." The king Horus is saluted as "the sun of the nine people; great is thy name to the country of Ethiopia;" "the gracious god returns, having subdued the great of all people." Setj I (or Sethos) is exhibited, as revered by the Armenians, conquering the Sasou, the "Hittites, Naharina (Mesopotamia), the Routen (Assyrians?) the Pount, or Arabs in the S. of Arabia, the Amari or Amorites, and Kedes, perhaps Edessa." Rameses II., or the great (identified with the Pharaoh of the Exodus<sup>10</sup>), conquered the Hittites in the N.; in the S. it is recorded, "the gracious god, who defeated the nine people, who massacred myriads in a moment, annihilated the people overthrown in their blood, yet was there no other with him." The 20th Dynasty (B. C. 1288-1110) began again with conquests. "Rameses III. triumphed over great confederations of Libyans and Syrians and the Isles of the Mediterranean. He is the only king who, as the monuments shew, carried on war at once by land and sea." Besides many names unknown to us, the Hittites, Amorites, Circesium, Aratus, Philistines, Phœnicia, Sasou, Pount, are again recognised. North South East and West are declared to be tributary to him, and of the North it is said, "The people, who knew not Egypt, come to thee, bringing gold and silver, lapis-lazuli, all precious stones." He adorned Thebes with the great temple of Medinet-Abou<sup>14</sup> and the Ramesseum<sup>15</sup>. The brief notices of following Rameses' speak of internal prosperity and wealth: a fuller account of Rameses XII. speaks of his "being in Mesopotamia to exact the annual tribute," how "the kings of all countries prostrated themselves before him, and the king of the country of Bouchten [it has been conjectured, Bagistan, or Ecbatana] presented to him tribute and his daughter." "He is the last Pharaoh who goes to Mesopotamia, to collect the annual tributes of the petty kingdoms of that country." On this side of the Euphrates, Egypt still retained some possessions to the time of Necho; for it is said, "the king of Babylon had taken from the river of Egypt unto the river Euphrates all that pertained to the king of Egypt." Thebes continued to be embellished alike by "the high-priests of Ammon," who displaced the ancient line<sup>19</sup>, and kings of the Bubastite Dynasty, Sesonchis I. or Sisak<sup>20</sup>, Takelothis II.<sup>21</sup>, and Sesonchis III.<sup>22</sup>. The Ethiopian dynasty of Sabakos and Tearko or Tirkaka in another way illustrates the importance of No. The Ethiopian conquerors chose it as their royal city. Thither, in the time of Sabakos, Syria brought it tribute<sup>23</sup>; there Tirkaka set up the records of his victories<sup>24</sup>; and great must have been the conqueror, whom Strabo put on a line with Sesostris<sup>25</sup>. Its site marked it out for a great capital; and as such the Ethiopian conqueror seized it. The hills on either side retired, encircling the plain, through the centre of which the Nile brought down its wealth, connecting it with the untold riches of the south. "They formed a vast circus, where the ancient metropolis expanded itself. On the West, the Lybian chain presents abrupt declivities which command this side of the plain, and which bend away above Bab-el-molouk, to end near Kournah at the very bank of the river. On the East, heights, softer and nearer, descend in long declivities toward Louksor and Karnak, and their crests do not approach the Nile until after Medamout, an hour or more below Karnak." The breadth of the valley, being about 10 miles<sup>26</sup>, the city (of which, Strabo says, "traces are now seen of its magnitude, 80 stadia in length") must have occupied the whole. "The çam city embraced the great space, which is now commonly called the plain of Thebes and which is divided by the Nile into two halves, an Eastern and a Western, the first bounded by the edge of the Arabian wilderness, the latter by the hills of the dead of the steep Libyan chain." The capital of Egypt, which was identified of old with Egypt itself<sup>29</sup>, thus lay under the natural guardianship of the encircling hills which expanded to receive it, divided into two by the river which was a wall to both. The chains of hills, on either side were themselves fenced in on East and West by the great sand-deserts unapproachable by an army. The long valley of the Nile was the only access to an enemy. It occupied apparently the victorious army of Asshur-banipal<sup>30</sup> "a month and ten days" to march from Memphis to Thebes. "At Thebes itself there are still remains of walls and fortifications, strong, skilfully constructed, and in good preservation, as there are also in other Egyptian towns above and below it. The crescent-shaped ridge of hills approaches so close to the river at each end as to admit of troops defiling past, but not spreading out or manœuvring. At each of these ends is a small old fort of the purely Egyptian, i. e. the Ante-Hellenic period. Both above and below there are several similar crescent sweeps in the same chain of hills, and at each angle a similar fort."

<sup>31</sup> Miss Harris, the learned daughter of a learned Egyptologist; "In several hieroglyphical inscriptions and notably in a papyrus in Miss Harris' possession, partly deciphered by her father and herself, there are minute accounts of fortresses existing at that date, about the time of the Exodus, she supposes, and of their armaments and garrisons." Thebes then was fortified, as well as Nineveh, and Homer is confirmed by the Hieroglyphical inscriptions.

All successive monarchs, during more centuries than have passed since our Lord came, successively beautified it. Every thing is gigantic, bearing witness to the enormous mass of human strength, which its victorious kings had gathered from all nations to toil for its and their glorification. Wonderful is it now in its decay, desolation, death; one great idol-temple of its gods and an apotheosis of its kings, as sons of its gods.

"<sup>1</sup> What spires are to a modern city, what the towers of a cathedral are to the nave and choir, that the statues of the Pharaohs were to the streets and temples of Thebes. The ground is strewn with their fragments; the avenues of them towered high above plain and houses. Three of gigantic size still remain. One was the granite statue of Rameses himself, who sat on the right side of the entrance to his palace.—The only part of the temple or palace, at all in proportion to him, must have been the gateway, which rose in pyramidal towers, now broken down and rolling in a wild ruin down to the plain." It was that self-deifying, against which Ezekiel is commanded to prophesy; <sup>2</sup> Speak and say; thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself. "<sup>3</sup> Every where the same colossal proportions are preserved. Every where the king is conquering, ruling, worshipping, worshipped. The palace is the temple. The king is priest. He and his horses are ten times the size of the rest of the army. Alike in battle and in worship, he is of the same stature as the gods themselves. Most striking is the familiar gentleness, with which, one on each side, they take him by each hand, as one of their own order, and then, in the next compartment, introduce him to Ammon, and the lion-headed goddess. Every distinction, except of degree, between divinity and royalty is entirely levelled." Gigantic dimensions picture to the eye the ideal greatness, which is the key to the architecture of No. "<sup>4</sup> Two other statues alone remain of an avenue of eighteen similar or nearly similar statues, some of whose remnants lie in the field behind them, which led to the palace of Amenophis III., every one of the statues being Amenophis himself, thus giving in multiplication what Rameses gained in solitary elevation." "<sup>5</sup> Their statues were all of one piece." Science still cannot explain, how a mass of nearly 890 tons<sup>6</sup> of granite was excavated at Syene, transported<sup>7</sup> and set up at Thebes, or how destroyed<sup>8</sup>.

"<sup>9</sup> The temper of the tools, which cut adamantine stone as sharply and closely as an ordinary scoop cuts an ordinary cheese, is still a mystery." Every thing is in proportion. The two sitting colossi, whose "breadth across the shoulders is eighteen feet, their height forty-seven feet, fifty-three above the plain, or, with the half-buried pedestal, sixty feet, were once connected by an avenue of sphinxes of eleven hundred feet with what is now 'Kom-el-Hettán,' or 'the mound of sand-stone,' which marks the site of another palace and temple of Amenophis III.; and, to judge from the little that remains, it must have held a conspicuous rank among the finest monuments of Thebes. All that now exists of the interior are the bases of its columns, some broken statues, and Syenite sphinxes of the king, with several lion-headed figures of black granite<sup>10</sup>. The four villages, where are the chief remaining temples, Karnak, Luksor, Medinet-Abou, Kournah, form a great quadrilateral<sup>11</sup>, each of whose sides is about one and a half mile, and the whole compass accordingly six miles. The avenue of six hundred sphinxes, which joined the temple of Luksor with Karnak must have been one and a half mile long<sup>12</sup>: one of its obelisks is a remarkable ornament of Paris. Mostly massiveness is the characteristic, since strength and might were their ideal. Yet the massive columns still preserved, as in the temple of Rameses II.<sup>13</sup>, are even of piercing beauty<sup>14</sup>. And for the temple of Karnak! Its enclosure, which was some two miles in circumference<sup>15</sup>, bears the names of Monarchs removed from one another, according to the Chronology, by above two thousand years<sup>16</sup>. "<sup>17</sup> A stupendous colonnade, of which one pillar only remains erect, once extended across its great court, connecting the W. gate of entrance with that at its extremity. The towers of the Eastern gate are mere heaps of stones, poured down into the court on one side and the great hall on the other; giant columns have been swept away like reeds before the mighty avalanche, and one hardly misses them. And in that hall, of 170 feet by 329 feet, 134 columns of colossal proportions supported its roof; twelve of them, 62 feet high and about 35 in circumference, and on each side a forest of 66 columns, 42 feet 5 in. in height. Beyond the centre-avenue are seen obelisks, gateways and masses of masonry; every portion of these gigantic ruins is covered with sculpture most admirably executed, and every column has been richly painted."

"<sup>18</sup> Imagine a long vista of courts and doorways and colonnades and halls; here and there an obelisk shooting up out of the ruins, and interrupting the opening view of the forest of columns.—This mass of ruins, some rolled down in avalanches of stone, others perfect and painted, as when they were first built, is approached on every side by avenues of gateways. E. and W., N. and S., these vast approaches are found. Some are shattered, but in every approach some remain; and in some can be traced, besides, the further avenues, still in parts remaining by hundreds together, avenues of ram-headed sphinxes. Every Egyptian temple has, or ought to have, one of those grand gateways, formed of two sloping towers, with the high perpendicular front between." Then, over and above, is "their multiplied concentration.—Close before almost every gateway in this vast array were the colossal figures, usually in granite, of the great Rameses, sometimes in white and red marble, of Amenophis and of Thothmes. Close by them, were pairs of towering obelisks, which can generally be traced by pedestals on either side.—You have only to set up again the fallen obelisks which lie at your feet; to conceive the columns, as they are still seen in parts, overspreading the whole; to reproduce all the statues, like those which still remain in their august niches, to gaze on the painted walls and pillars of the immense hall, which even now can never be seen without a thrill

They are of one single stone, and the largest in Egypt (that of the great temple at Karnak) I calculate to weigh 297 tons. This was brought about 138 miles from the quarry to where it now stands; those taken to Heliopolis, more than 800 miles. The power, however, to move the mass was the same, whatever might be the distance, and the mechanical skill which transported it five or even one, would suffice for any number of miles. of awe, and you have ancient Thebes before you." And most of those paintings were records of their past might. "There remained on the massive buildings Egyptian letters, recording their former wealthiness; and one of the elder priests, bidden to interpret his native language, related that of old 700,000 of military age dwelt there; and with that army king Rhameses gained possession of Libya, Ethiopia, the Medes and Persians, the Bactrian and Scythian; and held in his empire the countries which the Syrians and Armenians and neighbouring Cappadocians inhabit, the Bithynian also and Lycian to the sea. There were read too the tributes imposed on the natives, the weight of silver and gold; the number of arms and horses, and the gifts to the temples, ivory and frankincense, and what supplies of corn and utensils each nation should pay, not less magnificent than are now enjoined by Parthian violence or by Roman power."

That was situate lit. the dweller, she that dwelleth. Perhaps the Prophet wished to express the security and ease<sup>2</sup>, in which she dwelt among the rivers. They encircled, folded round her, as it were, so that she was a little world in herself, secluded from all who would approach to hurt her. The Prophet's word, rivers<sup>3</sup>, is especially used of the branches or canals of the Nile, which is also called the sea<sup>4</sup>. The Nile passed through No, and doubtless its canals encircled it. Egypt is said by a Heathen to be "walled by the Nile as an everlasting wall." Whose rampart was [rampart is] the sea. Wall and rampart<sup>5</sup> are, properly, the outer and inner wall of a city, the wall and forewall, so to speak. For all walls and all defences, her enfolding walls of sea would suffice. Strong she was in herself; strong also in her helpers.

9. Ethiopia and Egypt were her strength; lit. Egypt was strength<sup>7</sup>, and Ethiopia, and boundless. He sets forth first the imperial might of No; then her strength from foreign, subdued power. The capital is a sort of impersonation of the might of the state; No, of Egypt, as Nineveh, of Assyria. When the head was cut off or the heart ceased to beat, all was lost. The might of Egypt and Ethiopia was the might of No, concentrated in her. They were strength, and that strength unmeasured by any human standard. Boundless was the strength, which Nineveh had subdued: boundless, the

<sup>4</sup> Is. xviii. 2, xix. 5. In Arabic, the Nile is called "the sweet sea" in contrast with "the salt sea," or "the encircling sea;" a title given by Egyptian writers to the Mediterranean, as being connected with the Ocean. Egyptian writers mostly add an epithet to נָחַם, to designate the sea, because נָחַם, simply, is the Nile; as in India it is the Ganges; in Mesopotamia, the Euphrates. De Sacy Chrest. Arab. ii. 14, 15. ed. 2. The "white Nile" is called "Bahr-el-Abiad," the "blue Nile" Bahr-el-Azrek, and the great Ethiopian tributary to the Nile, the Albara, "Bahr-el-Aswad," "the black sea." store<sup>8</sup> which she had accumulated for the spoiler; boundless<sup>9</sup> the carcasses of her slain. And it was infinite. "The people that came up with the king out of Egypt, were without number<sup>10</sup>." The Egyptians connected with Thebes are counted by a heathen author<sup>11</sup> at seven millions. Put or Phut<sup>12</sup> is mentioned third among the sons of Ham, after Cush and Mizraim<sup>13</sup>. They are mentioned with the Ethiopians in Pharaoh's army at the Euphrates<sup>14</sup>, as joined with them in the visitation of Egypt<sup>15</sup>; with Cush in the army of Gog<sup>16</sup>; with Lud in that of Tyre<sup>17</sup>; a country and river of that name were, Josephus tells us<sup>18</sup>, "frequently mentioned by Greek historians." They dwelt in the Libya, conterminous to the Canopic mouth of the Nile<sup>19</sup>.

And Lubim. These came up against Judah in the army of Shishak<sup>10</sup> against Rehoboam, and with the Ethiopians, "a huge host" under Zerah the Ethiopian against Asa<sup>20</sup>. The Ribou or Libou appear on the monuments as a people conquered by Menephtich<sup>21</sup> and Rameses III.<sup>22</sup> They were still to be united with Egypt and the Ethiopians in the times of Antiochus Epiphanes<sup>23</sup>; so their connection with Egypt was not broken by its fall. Those unwearied enemies had become incorporated with her; and were now her help. These were (E. M.) in thy help; set upon it, given up to it<sup>24</sup>. The prophet appeals to No herself, as it were, "Thou hadst strength." Then he turns away, to speak of her, unwilling to look on the miseries which he has to pourtray to Nineveh, as the preludes of her own. Without God, vain is the help of man.

10. Yet was she [also<sup>25</sup>] carried away, lit. She also became an exile<sup>26</sup> band, her people were carried away, with all the barbarities of Heathen war. who fulfilled prophecy in the restoration of Judah, fulfilled it also in the conquest of Egypt and Ethiopia. Both perhaps out of human policy in part. But Cambyzes' wild hatred of Egyptian idolatry fulfilled God's word. Ptolemy Lathyrus carried on the work of Cambyzes; the Romans, Ptolemy's. Cambyzes burnt its temples<sup>1</sup>; Lathyrus its four-or five-storied private houses<sup>2</sup>; the Roman Gallus levelled it to the ground<sup>3</sup>. A little after it was said of her, "she is inhabited as so many scattered villages." A little after our Lord's Coming, Germanicus went to visit, not it, but "the vast traces of it." "It lay overwhelmed with its hundred gates" and utterly impoverished. No was powerful as Nineveh, and less an enemy of the people of God. For though these often suffered from Egypt, yet in those times they even trusted too much to its help<sup>4</sup>. If then the judgements of God came upon No, how much more upon Nineveh! In type, Nineveh is the image of the world as oppressing God's Church; No, rather of those who live for this life, abounding in wealth, ease, power, and forgetful of God. If, then, they were punished, who took no active part against God, fought not against God's truth, yet still were sunk in the cares and riches and pleasures of this life, what shall be the end of those who openly resist God?

11. Thou also. As thou hast done, so shall it be done unto thee. The cruelties on No, in the cycle of God's judgements, draw on the like upon Nineveh who inflicted them. Thou also<sup>5</sup> shalt be drunken with the same cup of God's anger, entering within thee as wine doth, bercaving thee of reason and of counsel through the greatness of thy anguish, and bringing shame on thee<sup>6</sup>, and a stupefaction like death. Thou shalt be hid, a thing hidden<sup>10</sup> from the eyes of men, as though thou hadst never been. Nahum had foretold her complete desolation: he had asked, where is she? Here he describes an abiding condition; strangely fulfilled, as perhaps never to that extent besides; her palaces, her monuments, her records of her glorious triumphs existed still in their place, but hidden out of sight, as in a tomb, under the hill-like mounds along the Tigris. Thou also shalt seek strength, or a strong-hold from the enemy<sup>11</sup>, out of thyself, since thine own shall be weakness. Yet in vain, since God is not such to thee<sup>12</sup>. "They shall seek, but not find." "For then shall it be too late to cry for mercy, when it is the time of justice." He shall have judgement without mercy, that hath shewed no mercy<sup>13</sup>.

12. All thy strong-holds shall be like fig trees, with the first ripe figs, hanging from them<sup>14</sup>; eagerly sought after<sup>15</sup>, to be consumed. Being ripe, they are ready to fall at once; if they be shaken; it needeth but the tremulous motion, as when trees wave in the wind<sup>16</sup>, they shall even fall into the mouth of the eater, not costing even the slight pains of picking them from the ground<sup>17</sup>. So easy is their destruction on the part of God, though it cost more pains to the Babylonians. At the end of the world it shall be yet more fulfilled<sup>18</sup>, for then God will use no human instrument, but put forth only His own Almightiness; and all strong-holds of man's pride, moral or spiritual, shall, of themselves, melt away.

13. Behold, thy people in the midst of thee are women. Fierce, fearless, hard, iron men, such as their warriors still are portrayed by themselves on their monuments, they whom no toil wearied, no peril daunted, shall be, one and all, their whole people, women. So Jeremiah to Babylon, "they shall become, became, women." He sets it before the eyes. Behold, thy people are women; against nature they are such, not in tenderness but in weakness and fear. Among the signs of the Day of Judgement, it stands, men's hearts failing them for fear<sup>20</sup>. Where sin reigns, there is no strength left, no manliness or nobleness of soul, no power to resist. In the midst of thee, where thou seemest most secure, and, if any where, there were hope of safety. The very inmost self of the sinner gives way.

To thine enemies (this is, for emphasis, prefixed) not for any good to thee, but to thine enemies shall be set wide open the gates of thy land, not, thy gates, i. e. the gates of their cities, (which is a distinct idiom), but the gates of the land itself, every avenue, which might have been closed against the invader, but which was laid open. The Easterns<sup>21</sup>, as well as the Greeks and Latins<sup>22</sup>, used the word "gate" or "doors" of the mountain-passes, which gave an access to a land, but which might be held against an enemy. In the pass called "the Caucasian gates," there were, over and above, doors fastened with iron bars<sup>23</sup>. At Thermopylae or, as the Inhabitants called them, Pylæ<sup>1</sup>, "gates," the narrow pass was further guarded by a wall<sup>2</sup>. Its name recalls the brilliant history, how such approaches might be held by a devoted handful of men against almost countless multitudes. Of Assyria, Pliny says, "The Tigris and pathless mountains encircle Adiabene." When those gates of the land gave way, the whole land was laid open to its enemies.

"Bab-el-Howa" "gate of the winds" is said to be a mountain gorge (Ritter xviii. 849. Buckingham gives the name to a gate of Boara. Travels among Arabs ii. 200). Bab-el-Mardin is the name of a mountain-pass in the Masius chain (Ritter xi. 263. 393. 464), "a remarkable gap or notch in the chain of Mt. Masius, behind which is situated the city of Mardin." Forbes on the Sinjar Hills, Mem. R. Geogr. Soc. 1839 p. 421. The name "Bab-el-mandeb" shows that the name "door" is given to narrow straits also, as is that of πόλες (See Lidd. and Scott Lex. v. πόλες). The Arab. باب only incidentally illustrates the idiom, being, not a "gate" (as Röd. in Ges. Thes.) but "a gap, interstice, hence a mountain-pass, an access to a country," and specifically "a border-country towards an enemy," and in the idiom נִסְתָּרָה, "stopped the gap," like נִסְתָּרָה Es. xxii. 30. enemies: the fire shall devour thy bars.

The fire shall devour thy bars. Probably, as elsewhere, the bars of the gates, which were mostly of wood, since it is added expressly of some, that they were of the iron<sup>4</sup> or brass<sup>5</sup>. "Occasionally the efforts of the besiegers were directed against the gate, which they endeavoured to break open with axes, or to set on fire by application of a torch.—In the hot climate of S. Asia wood becomes so dry by exposure to the sun, that the most solid doors may readily be ignited and consumed." It is even remarked in one instance that the Assyrians "have not set fire to the gates of this city, as appeared to be their usual practice in attacking a fortified place."

So were her palaces buried as they stood, that the traces of prolonged fire are still visible, calcining the one part and leaving others which were not exposed to it, uncalcined. "It is incontestable that, during the excavations, a considerable quantity of charcoal, and even pieces of wood, either half-burnt or in a perfect state of preservation, were found in many places. The lining of the chambers also bears certain marks of the action of fire. All these things can be explained only by supposing the fall of a burning roof, which calcined the slabs of gypsum and converted them into dust. It would be absurd to imagine that the burning of a small quantity of furniture could have left on the walls marks like these which are to be seen through all the chambers, with the exception of one, which was only an open passage. It must have been a violent and prolonged fire, to be able to calcine not only a few places, but every part of these slabs, which were ten feet high and several inches thick. So complete a decomposition can be attributed but to intense heat, such as would be occasioned by the fall of a burning roof.

"Botta found on the engraved flag-stones scoria and half-melted nails, so that there is no doubt that these appearances had been produced by the action of intense and long-sustained heat. He remembers, besides, at Khorsabad, that when he detached some bas-reliefs from the earthy substance which covered them, in order to copy the inscriptions that were behind, he found there coals and cinders, which could have entered only by the top, between the wall and the back of the bas-relief. This can be easily understood to have been caused by the burning of the roof, but is inexplicable in any other manner. What tends most positively to prove that the traces of fire must be attributed to the burning of a wooden roof is, that these traces are perceptible only in the interior of the building. The gypsum also that covers the wall inside is completely calcined, while the outside of the building is nearly every where untouched. But wherever the fronting appears to have at all suffered from fire, it is at the bottom; thus giving reason to suppose that the damage has been done by some burning matter falling outside. In fact, not a single bas-relief in a state to be removed was found in any of the chambers, they were all pulverised."

The soul which does not rightly close its senses against the enticements of the world, does, in fact, open them, and death is come up into our windows<sup>9</sup>, and then "whatever natural good there yet be, which, as bars, would hinder the enemy from bursting in, is consumed by the fire," once kindled, of its evil passions.

14. Draw thee waters for the siege; fortify thy strongholds. This is not mere mockery at man's weakness, when he would resist God. It foretells that they shall toil, and that, heavily. Toil is added upon toil. Nineveh did undergo a two years' siege. Water stands for all provisions within. He bids them, as before<sup>11</sup>, strengthen what was already strong; strongholds, which seemed to "cut off" all approach. These he bids them strengthen, not repairing decays only but making them exceeding strong<sup>13</sup>. Go into clay. We seem to see all the inhabitants, like ants on their nest, all poured out, every one busy, every one making preparation for the defence. Why had there been no need of it? What needed she of towers and fortifications, whose armies were carrying war into distant lands, before whom all which was near was hushed? Now, all had to be renewed. As Isaiah in his mockery of the idol-makers begins with the forging of the axe, the planting and rearing of the trees, which were at length to become the idol<sup>14</sup>, Nahum goes back to the beginning. The neglected brick-kiln, useless in their prosperity, was to be repaired; the clay<sup>15</sup>, which abounded in the valley of the Tigris<sup>16</sup>, was to be collected, mixed and kneaded by treading, as still represented in the Egyptian monuments. The conquering nation was to do the work of slaves, as Asiatic captives are represented, under their taskmasters<sup>17</sup>, on the monuments of Egypt, a prelude of their future. Xenophon still saw the massive brick-wall, on the stone foundation<sup>18</sup>.

Yet, though stored within and fenced without, it shall not stand<sup>19</sup>.

15. There, where thou didst fence thyself, and madest such manifold and toilsome preparation, shall the fire devour thee. All is toil within. The fire of God's wrath falls and consumes at once. Mankind still, with mire and clay, build themselves Babels. They go into clay, and become themselves earthly like the mire they steep themselves in. They make themselves strong, as though they thought that their houses shall continue for ever<sup>20</sup>, and say, "Soul, take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry. God's wrath descends. Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee. It shall eat thee up like the canker-worm. What in thee is strongest, shall be devoured with as much ease as the locust devours the tender grass. The judgements of God, not only overwhelm as a whole, but find out each tender part, as the locust devours each single blade.

Nay, He saith, thou hast essayed to do it.

16. Thou hast multiplied thy merchants above the stars of Heaven; not numerous only but glorious in the eyes of the world, and, as thou deemest, safe and inaccessible; yet in an instant all is gone.

The commerce of Nineveh was carried back to præhistoric times, since its rivers bound together the mountains of Armenia with the Persian gulf, and marked out the line, by which the distant members of the human family should supply each others' needs. "Semiramis," they say<sup>3</sup>, "built other cities on the Euphrates and the Tigris, where she placed emporia for those who convey their goods from Media and Parætacene. Being mighty rivers and passing through a populous country, they yield many advantages to those employed in commerce; so that the places by the river are full of wealthy emporia." The Phœnicians traced back their Assyrian commerce (and as it seems, truly) to those same præhistoric times, in which they alleged, that they themselves migrated from the Persian gulf. They commenced at once, they said<sup>4</sup>, the long voyages, in which they transported the wares of Egypt and Assyria. The building of "Tadmor in the wilderness"<sup>5</sup> on the way to Tiphach (Thapsacus) the utmost bound of Solomon's dominions<sup>6</sup>, connected Palestine with that commerce. The great route for couriers and for traffic, extending for fifteen hundred or sixteen hundred miles in later times, must have lain through Nineveh, since, although no mention is made of the city which had perished, the route lay across the two rivers<sup>7</sup>, the greater and lesser Zab, of which the greater formed the Southern limit of Nineveh. Those two rivers led up to two mountain-passes which opened a way to Media and Agbatana; and pillars at the summit of the N. pass attest the use of this route over the Zagros chain about 700 B. C.<sup>8</sup> Yet a third and easier pass was used by Nineveh, as is evidenced by another monument, of a date as yet undetermined<sup>9</sup>. Two other lines connected Nineveh with Syria and the West. Northern lines led doubtless to Lake Wan and the Black Sea<sup>10</sup>. The lists of plunder or of tribute, carried off during the world-empire of Egypt, before it was displaced by Assyria, attest the extensive imports or manufactures of Nineveh<sup>11</sup>;

<sup>1</sup> חֲמֹרֵי expresses more than mere number. חֲמֹר retains always the idea of weight gravity or oppressiveness. We say "heavy hail" Ex. ix. 18, 24. It is used of the plague of flies, Ib. viii. 20, and, as here, of the locusts, Ib. x. 14; of the host, with which Esau opposed Israel, Nu. xx. 20, (adding חֲמֹרֵי עָרֵי); of that sent with Rabshakeh to Jerusalem, Is. xxxvi. 2, and of the great train of the Queen of Sheba, camels laden with very much gold and precious stones, 1 Kgs. x. 2. חֲמֹר occurs above iii. 3, of the heavy mass of corpses. In Ex. ix. 3, it is used of a grievous pestilence (Gesenius' instances Thes. s. v.).

<sup>2</sup> The two genders, חֲמֹרֵי, חֲמֹרֵי, are probably joined together, the more strongly to express universality, חֲמֹרֵי וְחֲמֹרֵי, Is. iii. 1; and Nahum himself unites חֲמֹרֵי and חֲמֹרֵי in two parallel clauses, ii. 18.

A line of commerce, so marked out by nature in the history of nations, is not changed, unless some preferable line be discovered. Empires passed away, but at the end of the 13th century trade and manufacture continued their wonted course and habitation. The faith in Jesus had converted the ancient heathenism; the heresy of Mohammedanism disputed with the faith for the souls of men; but the old material prosperity of the world held its way. Mankind still wanted the productions of each others' lands. The merchants of Nineveh were to be dispersed and were gone: itself and its remembrance were to be effaced from the earth, and it was so; in vain was a new Nineveh built by the Romans; that also disappeared; but so essential was its possession for the necessities of commerce, that Mosul, a large and populous town, arose over against its mounds, a city of the living over-against its buried glories; and, as our goods are known in China by the name of our great manufacturing capital, so a delicate manufacture imposed on the languages of Europe (Italian, Spanish, French, English, German) the name of Mosul<sup>16</sup>.

Even early in this century, under a mild governor, an important commerce passed through Mosul, from India, Persia, Kurdistan, Syria, Natolia, Europe<sup>17</sup>. And when European traffic took the line of the Isthmus of Suez, the communication with Kurdistan still secured to it an important and exclusive commerce. The merchants of Nineveh were dispersed and gone. The commerce continued over-against its grave.

The cankerworm spoileth and fleeth away; better, the locust hath spread itself abroad (marauded) and is flown. The prophet gives, in three words<sup>18</sup>, the whole history of Nineveh, its beginning and its end. He had before foretold its destruction, though it should be oppressive as the locust; he had spoken of its commercial wealth; he adds to this, that other source of its wealth, its despoiling warfares and their issue. The heathen conqueror rehearsed his victory, "I came, saw, conquered." The prophet goes farther, as the issue of all human conquest, "I disappeared." The locust [Nineveh] spread itself abroad (the word is always used of an inroad for plunder<sup>1</sup>), destroying and wasting, everywhere: it left the world a desert, and was gone<sup>2</sup>. Ill-gotten wealth makes poor, not rich. Truly they who traffic in this world, are more in number than they who, seeking treasure in Heaven, shall shine as the stars for ever and ever. For many are called, but few are chosen. And when all the stars of light "shall abide and praise God<sup>3</sup>, these men, though multiplied like the locust, shall, like the locust, pass away, destroying and destroyed. They abide for a while in the chillness of this world; when the Sun of righteousness ariseth, they vanish. This is the very order of God's Providence. As truly as locusts, which in the cold and dew are chilled and stiffened, and cannot spread their wings, fly away when the sun is hot and are found no longer, so shalt thou be dispersed and thy place not any more be known<sup>4</sup>. It was an earnest of this, when the Assyrians, like locusts, had spread themselves around Jerusalem in a dark day of trouble and of rebuke and of blasphemy<sup>5</sup>, God was entreated and they were not. Midian came up like the grasshopper for multitude<sup>6</sup>. In the morning they had fled<sup>7</sup>. What is the height of the sons of men? or how do they spread themselves abroad?" At the longest, after a few years it is but as the locust spreadeth himself and fleeth away, no more to return.

17. Thy crowned are as the locust, and thy captains as the great locusts. What he had said summarily under metaphor, the prophet expands in a likeness. The crowned<sup>8</sup> are probably the subordinate princes, of whom Sennacherib said<sup>9</sup>, Are not my princes altogether kings? It has been observed that the head-dress of the Assyrian Vizier has the ornament which "throughout the whole series of sculptures is the distinctive mark of royal or quasi-royal authority."<sup>10</sup> All high officers of state, the crowned captains, were adorned with diadems, closely resembling the lower band of the royal mitre, separated from the cap itself. Such was that of the vizier, which was broader in front than behind, was adorned with rosettes and compartments, and terminated in two ribbons with embroidered and fringed ends, which hung down his back." Captain is apparently the title of some military office of princely rank. One such Jeremiah<sup>11</sup>, in a prophecy in which he probably alludes to this, bids place over the armies of Ararat, Minni, and Ashchenaz, to marshal them against Babylon, against which he summons the cavalry like the rough locust. The captains are likened to the great caterpillars<sup>12</sup>, either as chief in devastation, or as including under them the armies under their command, who moved at their will. These and their armies now subsided into stillness for a time under the chill of calamity, like the locust "whose nature it is, that, torpid in the cold, they fly in the heat." The stiffness of the locusts through the cold, when they lie motionless, heaps upon heaps, hidden out of sight, is a striking image of the helplessness of Nineveh's mightiest in the day of her calamity; then, by a different part of their history, he pictures their entire disappearance. "The locusts, are commonly taken in the morning when they are agglomerated one on another, in the places where they passed the night. As soon as the sun warms them, they fly away." When the sun ariseth, they flee away<sup>13</sup>, lit. it is chased away<sup>14</sup>. One and all; all as one. As at God's command the plague of locusts, which He had sent on Egypt, was removed<sup>15</sup>; there remained not one locust in all the coasts of Egypt; so the mighty of Nineveh were driven forth, with no trace where they had been, where they were. The wind carried them away<sup>16</sup>; the wind passeth over him and he is not, and his place knoweth him no more<sup>17</sup>. The triumphing of the wicked is short, and the joy of the ungodly for a moment: though his excellency mount up to the heavens, and his head reach unto the clouds, yet he shall perish for ever; they which have seen him shall say, where is he? He shall fly away, as a dream, and shall not be found; neither shall his place any more behold him<sup>18</sup>.

The place (Hos. vii. 1) or country (1 Chr. xiv. 9, 13, 2 Chr. xxv. 18, xxviii. 18) is joined with וְ, and once (1 Sam. xxx. 14) stands in the accus. The idiom וְ בְּ וְ, "put off his clothes," is distinct. The object of the verb is always added Lev. vi. 4, xvi. 23, 1 Sam. xix. 24, Cant. v. 8, Ez. xxvi. 16, xlv. 19, Neh. iv. 17; except that, in Is. xxvii. 11, it is implied by the context, "strip ye, make ye bare." Credner's theory then (followed by Ewald Froph. iii. 14. ed. 2.) that וְ signifies the locust in its last moulting, which strips off the involucre of its wings, is contrary to the use of וְ, as well as to that of וְ. See ab. on Joel p. 98. Gesenius, under וְ, contradicts the explanation which he had given under וְ from Credner.

Where they are. So Zechariah asks, Your fathers, where are they<sup>19</sup>? History, experience, human knowledge can answer nothing. They can only say, where they are not. God Alone can answer that much-containing word, Where-<sup>20</sup> they<sup>21</sup>. They had disappeared from human sight, from their greatness, their visible being, their place on earth.

They have slept their sleep. The prophet speaks of the future, as already past in effect, as it was in the will of God. All "the shepherds of the people"<sup>1</sup>, all who could shepherd them, or hold them together, themselves sleep the sleep of death; their mighty men dwelt<sup>2</sup> in that abiding-place, where they shall not move or rise<sup>3</sup>, the grave; and so as Micaiah, in the vision predictive of Ahab's death<sup>4</sup>, saw all Israel scattered on the hills, as sheep that have not a shepherd, so the people of the Assyrian monarch shall be scattered on the mountains, shepherdless, and that irretrievably; no man gathereth them.

19. There is no healing [lit. dulling] of thy bruise; it cannot be softened or mitigated; and so thy wound is grievous [lit. sick], incurable, for when the wound ever anew inflames, † cannot be healed. The word, bruise, is the more expressive, because it denotes alike the abiding wound in the body<sup>5</sup>, and the shattering of a state, which God can heal<sup>6</sup>, or which may be great, incurable<sup>7</sup>. When the passions are ever anew aroused, they are at last without remedy; when the soul is ever swollen with pride, it cannot be healed; since only by submitting itself to Christ, "broken and contrite" by humility, can it be healed. Nineveh sank, and never rose; nothing soothed its fall. In the end there shall be nothing to mitigate the destruction of the world, or to soften the sufferings of the damned. The rich man, being in torments, asked in vain that Lazarus might dip the tip of his finger in water and cool my tongue.

Nineveh sinks out of sight amid one universal, exulting, exceeding joy<sup>8</sup> of all who heard the report of her. For upon whom hath not thy wickedness passed continually? "In that he asketh, upon whom hath not thy wickedness passed continually? he affirmeth most strongly that his evil did pass upon all continually." His wickedness, like one continual flood, which knew no ebb or bound, had passed upon the whole world and each one in it; now at length it had passed away, and the whole earth is at rest, is quiet; they break forth into singing<sup>9</sup>.

It is not without meaning, that having throughout the prophecy addressed Nineveh (in the feminine), now, in the close<sup>10</sup>, the prophet turns to him in whom all its wickedness is, as it were, gathered into one, the soul of all its evil, and the director of it, its king. As Nineveh is the image of the world, its pomps, wealth, luxury, vanity, wickedness, oppression, destruction, so its king is the image of a worse king, the Prince of this world. "And this is the song of triumph of those, over whom his wickedness has passed, not rested, but they have escaped out of his hands. Nahum, 'the comforter,' had rebuked the world of sin; now he pronounces that the prince of this world is judged. His shepherds are they who serve him, who feed the flock of the slaughter, who guide them to evil, not to good. These, when they sleep, as all mankind, dwell there; it is their abiding-place; their sheep are scattered on the mountains, in the heights of their pride, because they are not of the sheep of Christ; and since they would not be gathered of Him, they are scattered, where none gathereth." "The king of Assyria (Satan) knoweth that he cannot deceive the sheep, unless he have first laid the shepherds asleep. It is ever the aim of the devil to lay asleep souls that watch. In the Passion of the Lord, he weighed down the eyes of the Apostles with heavy sleep, whom Christ arouseth<sup>11</sup>, Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation; and again, What I say unto you, I say unto all, watch! And no man gathereth them, for their shepherds themselves cannot protect themselves. In the Day of God's anger, the kings of the earth and the great men, and the rich men and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every free man, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains<sup>12</sup>. Such are his shepherds, and his sheep; but what of himself? Truly his bruise or breaking can not be healed; his wound or smiting is incurable; that namely whereby, when he came to Him in Whom he found nothing<sup>13</sup>, yet bruised His heel, and exacted of Him a sinner's death, his own head was bruised." And hence all who have ears to hear, who hear not with the outward only, but with the inner ears of the heart, clap the hands over thee, i. e. give to God all their souls' thanks and praise, raise up their eyes and hands to God in heaven, praising Him Who had bruised Satan under their feet. Ever since, through the serpent, the evil and malicious One lied, saying, ye shall not surely die, eat and ye shall be as gods, hath his evil, continually and unceasingly, from one and through one, passed upon all men. As the Apostle saith, As by one man, sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned<sup>14</sup>. Upon whom then hath not his sin passed? Who hath not been shapen in iniquity? and whom did not his mother conceive in sin? Yet, it passeth only, for the world itself also passeth away, and we pass away from it, and all the evil it can do us, unless we share in its evil, is not abiding, but passing. This then is the cause, and a great cause, why all that hear the bruit of thee should clap the hands over thee; because thee, whose wickedness passed through one upon all, One Man, Who Alonewas without sin, contemned and bruised, while He freed and justified from wickedness them who hearing rejoiced, and rejoicing and believing, clapped the hands over thee. Yet they only shall be glad, upon whom his wickedness, although it passed, yet abode not, but in prayer and good deeds, by the grace of God, they lifted up their hands to Him Who overcame, and Who, in His own, overcometh still, to Whom be praise and thanksgiving for ever and ever. Amen.

INTRODUCTION

THE PROPHET HABAKKUK.

Habakkuk is eminently the prophet of reverential, awe-filled faith. This is the soul and centre of his prophecy. One word alone he addresses directly to his people. "It is of marvel at their want of faith. "Behold among the heathen and gaze attentively, and marvel, marvel; for I am working a work in your days; ye will not believe, when it is declared unto you. He bids them behold, and gaze, for God is about to work in their own days; he bids them prepare themselves to marvel, and marvel on; for it was a matter, at which political wisdom would stagger; and they, since they had not faith, would not believe it. The counterpart to this, is that great blessing of faith, which is the key-stone of his whole book, <sup>b</sup> the just shall live by his faith.

Isaiah had foretold to Hezekiah that his treasures should be carried to Babylon, his sons be eunuchs in the palace of its king<sup>c</sup>. He had foretold the destruction of Babylon and the restoration of the Jews<sup>d</sup>. Prophecy in Habakkuk, full as it is, is almost subordinate. His main subject is, that which occupied Asaph in the 73rd Psalm, the afflictions of the righteous amid the prosperity of the wicked. The answer is the same; the result of all will be one great reversal, the evil drawing upon themselves evil, God crowning the patient waiting of the righteous in still submission to His holy Will. The just shall live by his faith, occupies the same place in Habakkuk, as I know that my Redeemer liveth, does in Job<sup>e</sup>, or Thou shalt guide me with Thy counsel, and after that receive me into glory, in Asaph<sup>f</sup>.

His first subject<sup>g</sup> is, faith struggling under the oppressive sight of the sufferings of the good from the bad within God's people; the second<sup>h</sup>, the sufferings at the hands of those who are God's instruments to avenge that wickedness. The third<sup>i</sup>, that of his great hymn, is faith, not jubilant until the end, yet victorious, praying, believing, seeing in vision what it prays for, and triumphing in that, of which it sees no tokens, whose only earnest is God's old loving-kindnesses to His people, and His Name, under which He had revealed Himself, "He Who Is," the Unchangeable.

The whole prophecy is, so to speak, a colloquy between the prophet and God. He opens it with a reverential, earnest, appeal to God, like that of the saints under the heavenly Altar in the Revelations<sup>k</sup>, How long? The prophet had prayed to God to end or mitigate the violence, oppressions, strife, contention, despoiling, powerlessness of the law, crookedness of justice, entrapping of the righteous by the wicked<sup>l</sup>. God answers<sup>m</sup>, that a terrible day of retribution was coming, that He Himself would raise up the Chaldees, as the instruments of His chastisements, terrible, self-dependent, owning no law or authority but their own will, deifying their own power, sweeping the whole breadth of the land, possessing themselves of it, taking every fenced city, and gathering captives as the sand. This answers the one half of Habakkuk's question, as to the prosperity of the wicked among his people. It leaves the other half, as to the condition of the righteous, unanswered. For such scourges of God swept away the righteous with the wicked. Habakkuk then renews the question as to them. But, as Asaph began by declaring his faith, "All-good is God to Israel, the true Israel, the pure of heart, so Habakkuk, "Israel would not die, because He, their God, is Unchangeable." "Art not Thou of old, O Lord, my God, my holy One? we shall not die; Thou, O Lord, hast set him [the Chaldee] for judgement, and Thou, O Rock, hast founded him to chasten. Then he appeals to God, "Why then is this? Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil—wherefore keepest Thou silence, when the wicked devoureth him who is more righteous than he?" This closes the first chapter and the first vision, in which he describes, with the vividness of one who saw it before him, the irresistible invasion of the Chaldeans. Israel was meshed as in a net; should that net be emptied?<sup>n</sup>

The second chapter exhibits the prophet waiting in silent expectation for the answer. This answer too dwells chiefly on those retributions in this life, which are the earnest of future judgements, the witness of the sovereignty of God. But although in few words, it does answer the question as to the righteous, that he has abiding life, that he lives and shall live. God impresses the importance of the answer in the words<sup>o</sup>, Write the vision i. e. the prophecy, and make it plain on the tables, whereon the prophet was wont to write<sup>p</sup>, that he may run who reads it. He says also, that it is for a time fixed in the mind of God, and that however, in man's sight, it might seem to linger, it would not be aught behind the time<sup>q</sup>. Then he gives the answer itself in the words, "Behold his soul which is puffed up is not upright in him; and the just shall live by his faith. The swelling pride and self-dependence of the Chaldee stands in contrast with the trustful submission of faith. Of the one God says, it has no ground of uprightness, and consequently will not stand before God; of faith, he says, the righteous shall live by it. But the life plainly is not the life of the body. For Habakkuk's ground of complaint was the world-wasting cruelty of the Chaldees. The woe on the Chaldee which follows is even chiefly for bloodshed, in which the righteous and the wicked are massacred alike. The simple word, shall live, is an entire denial of death, a denial even of any interruption of life. It stands in the same fulness as those words of our Lord, "because I live, ye shall live also." The other side of the picture, the fall of the Chaldees, is given in greater fulness, because the fulfilment of God's word in things seen was the pledge of the fulfilment of those beyond the veil of sense and time. In a measured dirge he pronounces a five-fold woe on the five great sins of the Chaldees, their ambition<sup>a</sup>, covetousness<sup>b</sup>, violence<sup>c</sup>, insolence<sup>d</sup>, idolatry<sup>e</sup>. It closes with the powerlessness of the Chaldee idols against God, and bids the whole world be hushed before the presence of the One God, its Maker, awaiting His sentence.

Then follows the prayer<sup>f</sup>, that God would revive His work for Israel, which now seemed dead. He describes the revival as coming, under the images of God's miraculous deliverances of old. The division of the Red Sea and the Jordan, the standing-still of the sun and moon under Joshua, are images of future deliverances; all nature shakes and quivers at the presence of its Maker. Yet not it, but the wicked were the object of His displeasure. The prophet sees his people delivered as at the Red Sea, just when the enemy seemed ready to sweep them away, as with a whirlwind. And, in sight of the unseen, he closes with that wondrous declaration of faith, that all nature should be desolate, all subsistence gone, every thing, contrary to God's promises of old to His people, should be around him, and I will rejoice in the Lord, I will exult for joy in the God of my salvation.

This prophecy is not less distinct, because figurative. Rather it is the declaration of God's deliverance of His people, not from the Chaldees only, but at all times. The evil is concentrated in one Evil one, who stands over against the One anointed. Thou art gone forth for the salvation of Thy people; for salvation with Thine anointed One. Thou crushedst the head out of the house of the wicked One, laying bare the foundation unto the neck, i. e. smiting the house, at once, above and below; with an utter destruction. It belongs then the more to all times, until the closing strife between evil and good, Christ and Antichrist, the ἀντὶχρὸς and the Lord. It includes the Chaldec, and each great Empire which opposes itself to the kingdom of God, and declares that, as God delivered His people of old, so He would unto the end.

It may be that Habakkuk chose this name to express the strong faith, whereby he embraced the promises of God. At least, it means one who "strongly enfolds"<sup>g</sup>.

Perhaps too it is on account of the form in which his prophecy is cast, as being spoken (with the exception of that one verse) to God or to the Chaldean, not to his own people, that he added the title of Prophet to his name. The burden which

Habakkuk the prophet did see<sup>d</sup>. For, however the name "prophet" includes all to whom revelations from God came, it is nowhere, in the Old Testament, added as the name of an office to any one, who did not exercise the practical office of the Prophet. Our Lord quotes David as the Prophet<sup>e</sup>, and God says to Abimelech of Abraham<sup>f</sup>, He is a Prophet, and, in reference to this, the Psalmist speaks of the Patriarchs, as Prophets<sup>g</sup>. He reproveth kings for their sakes, saying, Touch not Mine anointed and do My prophets no harm, and Hosea speaks of Moses as a prophet<sup>h</sup>, and St. Peter says of David<sup>i</sup>, He being a prophet. But the title is nowhere in the Old Testament added to the name as it is here, Habakkuk the prophet, and as it is elsewhere Samuel the prophet<sup>k</sup>, the prophet Gad<sup>l</sup>, Nathan the prophet<sup>m</sup>, Ahijah the prophet<sup>n</sup>, the prophet Jehu<sup>o</sup>, Elijah the prophet<sup>p</sup>, Elisha the prophet<sup>q</sup>, Shemaiah the prophet<sup>r</sup>, the prophet Iddo<sup>s</sup>, the prophet Obadiah<sup>t</sup>, Isaiah the prophet<sup>u</sup>, Jeremiah the prophet<sup>v</sup>, Haggai the prophet<sup>x</sup>, unless any have exercised the prophetic office. The title of the Prophet is not, in the Old Testament, added to the names of Jacob or even of Moses or David or Solomon or Daniel, although they all prophesied of Christ.

Since Holy Scripture often conveys so much incidentally, it may be that a large range of ministerial office is hinted in the words "write on the tables;" for "the tables" must have been well-known tables, tables upon which prophets (as Isaiah) and probably Habakkuk himself was accustomed to write. The writing of a few emphatic unexplained words in a public place, which should arouse curiosity, or startle passers-by, would be in harmony with the symbolical actions, enjoined on the prophets and used by them. The Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin, had, from their mysteriousness, an impressiveness of their own, apart from the miracle of the writing.

The words appended to the prophecy, to the chief singer, (as we should say, "the leader of the band") with or on my stringed instruments, imply, not only that the hymn became part of the devotions of the temple, but that Habakkuk too had a part in the sacred music which accompanied it. The word so rendered, neginothai, could only mean my stringed instruments, or "my song accompanied with music," as Hezekiah says<sup>j</sup>, we will sing my songs on the stringed instruments, nenaggen neginothai. But in Habakkuk's subscription, "To the chief musician binginothai," neginoth can have no other meaning than in the almost identical inscription of Psalms, "To the chief musician binginoth," nor this any other than with stringed instruments, "instruments struck with the hand<sup>k</sup>." The addition, "with my stringed instruments," shews that Habakkuk himself was to accompany his hymn with instrumental music, and since the mention of the chief musician marks out that it was to form part of the temple-service, Habakkuk must have been entitled to take part in the temple-music, and so must have been a Levite. The Levitical order then had its prophet, as the sacerdotal in Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The tradition in the title to Bel and the Dragon, whatever its value, agrees with this; "<sup>l</sup> from the prophecy of Ambakum, son of Jesus, of the tribe of Levi."

This, however, does not give us any hint as to the time when

<sup>c</sup> There is no other form exactly like נבון. Yet it is manifestly intensive. It most resembles the form נבון "loved intensely." This form, in נבון, נבון, is changed into נבון, נבון. Equally נבון might be pronounced Habakkuk, the second ב being, as Delitzsch suggested, merged in the p, for greater facility of pronunciation. The י is a form like נבון, נבון, נבון; yet it is impossible that the reduplication should be meaningless. (as Ew. 157. a. p. 406. ed. 7.)

Habakkuk prophesied. For, bad as were the times of Manasseh and Amon, their idolatry consisted in associating idols with God, setting them up in His courts, bringing one even into His temple<sup>c</sup>, not in doing away His service. They set the two services, and the two opinions<sup>d</sup>, side by side, adding the false, but not abolishing the true, "consenting to differ," leaving to the worshippers of God their religion, while forcing them to endure, side by side, what seemed an addition, but what was, in fact, a denial. Habakkuk then might have been allowed to present his hymn for the temple-service, while the king placed in the same temple the statue of Ashtar, and required its devil's worship to be carried on there. The temple was allowed to go into some degree of decay, for Josiah had it repaired; but we read only of his removing idols<sup>e</sup>, not of his having to restore the disused service of God. Of Ahaz it is recorded, that he shut up the doors of the house of the Lord, which Hezekiah had to open<sup>f</sup>. Nothing of this sort is told of Manasseh and Amon.

Habakkuk, however, has two hints, which determine his age within a few years. He says that the invasion of the Chaldeans was to be in the days of those to whom he speaks; in your days<sup>h</sup>. Accordingly he must have spoken to adults, many of whom would survive that invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, in the 4th year of Jehoiakim B. C. 605. He can hardly have prophesied before B. C. 645, about the close of Manasseh's reign; for at this date, those who were 20 at the time of the prophecy, would have been 60, at the time of its commenced fulfilment at the battle of Carchemish. On the other hand, in that he speaks of that invasion as a thing incredible to those to whom he was speaking, he must have prophesied before Babylon became independent by the overthrow of Nineveh, B. C. 625. For when Babylon had displaced Nineveh, and divided the Empire of the East with Media and Egypt, it was not a thing incredible, that it would invade Judah in their own days, although it was beyond human knowledge to declare that it certainly would. The Babylonian Empire itself lasted only eighty-nine years; and, to human sight, Judah had as much or more to fear from Egypt as from Babylon. The Median Empire also might as well have swallowed up Judah for the time, as the Babylonian.

The relation of Zephaniah to Habakkuk coincides with this. Zephaniah certainly adopted the remarkable words<sup>i</sup>, lit. Hush at the presence of the Lord God, from Habakkuk's fuller form<sup>j</sup>, The Lord is in His holy temple; hush at His presence all the earth.

<sup>i</sup> Dr. Davidson says, "Delitzsch [with many others] maintains from a comparison of Hab. ii. 20, with Zeph. i. 7, that the former preceded the latter.—The premises are by no means safe or valid" [and, following Umbreit,] "'Be silent before the Lord God' (Zeph. i. 7.) sounds like a proverb: part of it having been already used by Amos (vi. 10)," iii. 804, 806. Amos has only the single word חש "hush!" which is, of course no fragment of a proverb. Nor was there any lack of expressions to bid men be still before their Maker. Delitzsch (ad loc. p. 102.) puts together the following; Ps. xcvi. 9. דלו סגור כל הארץ; xiv. 7. דלו סגור כל הארץ; 1 Chr. xvi. 30. דלו סגור כל הארץ; Ps. xxxiii. 8. ויראו כִּי כָל הָאָרֶץ, and the Psalm of Asaph, כִּשְׁכֹּם חִשְׁכֹּם דָּן אֶת יְהוָה וְשָׁכֵם, not to speak of other possible combinations, with חש, חשך, חש (which is thought to be only a stronger pronunciation of it. Kim. also explains חש by שָׁכֵם). When then a writer, who uses much the language of those before him, has an idiom which occurs once besides in Holy Scripture, there being many other expressions, which might equally have been used, any one unbiased would think that he adopted the language of the other. Stihelin admits the connection, but inverts the argument, contrary to the character of both prophets.

Hab. i. 8, עָרָב, עָרָב, עָרָב seems to have suggested the like description of the Chaldees cavalry, Jer. iv. 13, עָרָב, עָרָב, although, with the slight variation, which he commonly used, Jeremiah has עָרָב, after David probably on Saul and Jonathan,

But Zephaniah prophesied under Josiah, before the destruction of Nineveh B. C. 625, which he foretold<sup>m</sup>. Habakkuk was also, at latest, an earlier contemporary of Jeremiah who, in one place, at least, in his earlier prophecies, used his language<sup>n</sup>, as he does so often, of set purpose, that of the prophets before him, in order to shew that the fulness of their prophecies was not yet exhausted. But Jeremiah began to prophesy in the thirteenth year of Josiah B. C. 629<sup>o</sup>. Habakkuk, on the other hand, joins himself on with the old prophets and Psalms by the employment of language of Isaiah<sup>p</sup> and perhaps of Micah<sup>q</sup>, by the use of language of Deuteronomy<sup>r</sup>, and by the expansion of a Psalm of Asaph in his own Psalm<sup>s</sup>, but does not systematically renew their prophecies like Jeremiah<sup>t</sup> or Zephaniah<sup>u</sup>.

The ministry then of Habakkuk falls in the latter half of the reign of Manasseh or the earlier half of that of Josiah, (for the reign of Amon, being of two years only, is too short to come into account), and there is no decisive evidence for either against the other. In the reign of Manasseh, we are expressly told, that there were prophets, sent to foretell a destruction of Jerusalem as complete as that of Samaria, on account of the exceeding wickedness, into which Manasseh seduced his people. The Lord spake by His servants, the prophets, saying, Because Manasseh king of Judah hath done these abominations, and hath made Judah also to sin with his idols, Therefore thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Behold, I am bringing such evil upon Jerusalem and Judah, that whosoever heareth of it, both his ears shall tingle. And I will stretch over Jerusalem the line of Samaria and the plummet of the house of Ahab; and I will wipe Jerusalem as a man wipes a dish, wiping it and turning it upside down; and I will forsake the remnant of their inheritance, and deliver them into the hand of their enemies, and they shall become a prey and spoil to all their enemies<sup>v</sup>.

The sinful great men of Manasseh's and Amon's court and judicature are but too likely to have maintained their power in the early years of the reign of Josiah. For a boy of eight years old (at which age Josiah succeeded his father<sup>w</sup>) could, amid whatsoever sense of right and piety, do little to stem the established wrong and ungodliness of the evil counsellors and judges of his father and grandfather. The sins, which Jeremiah denounces, as the cause of the future captivity of Jerusalem, are the very same, of which Habakkuk complains, "oppression, violence, spoil." Jeremiah speaks, in the concrete, of total absence of right judgement<sup>x</sup>, as Habakkuk, in the abstract, of the powerlessness of the law<sup>y</sup>. Zephaniah gives the like picture of those earlier years under Josiah.<sup>c</sup> But Habakkuk's description would not suit the later years of Josiah, when judgement and justice were done. Did not thy father, Jeremiah appeals to Jehoiakim<sup>d</sup>, eat and drink, and do judgement and justice, and then it was well with him; he judged the cause of the poor and needy, then it was well with him; was not this to know Me? saith the Lord<sup>e</sup>. But while there is nothing to preclude his having prophesied in either reign, the earliest tradition places him in the close of the reign of Manasseh<sup>f</sup>.

Modern critics have assigned an earlier or later date to Habakkuk, accordingly as they believed that God did, or did not, reveal the future to man, that there was or was not, superhuman prophecy. Those who denied that God did endow His prophets with knowledge above nature, fell into two classes; 1) Such as followed Eichhorn's unnatural hypothesis, that prophecies were only histories of the past, spoken of, as if it were still future, to which these critics gave the shameless title of "vaticinia post eventum<sup>g</sup>." These plainly involved the prophets in fraud. 2) Those who laid down that each prophet lived at a time, when he could, with human foresight, tell what would happen. Would that those who count certainty, as to even a near future, to be so easy a thing, would try their hands at predicting the events of the next few years or months, or even days<sup>h</sup>, and, if they fail, acknowledge God's Truth! This prejudice, that there could be no real prophecy, ruled, for a time, all German criticism. It cannot be denied, that "the unbelief was the parent of the criticism, not the criticism of the unbelief." It is simple matter of history, that the unbelief came first; and, if men, a priori, disbelieved that there could be prophecy, it must needs be a postulate of their criticism, that what seemed to be prophecy could not have belonged to a date, when human foresight did not suffice for positive prediction. I will use the words of Delitzsch rather than my own;

"The investigation into the age of Habakkuk could be easily and briefly settled, if we would start from the prejudice, which is the soul of modern criticism, that a prediction of the future, which rested, not on human inferences or on a natural gift of divination, but on supernatural illumination, is impossible. For since Habakkuk foretold the invasion of the Chaldees, he must, in such case, have come forward at a time, at which natural acuteness could, with certainty, determine beforehand that sad event; accordingly in or after the time of the battle of Carchemish in the 4th year of Jehoiakim<sup>i</sup> 606 B. C. In this decisive battle Nebuchadnezzar defeated Pharaoh Necho, and it was more than probable that the king of Babylon would now turn against Judæa, since Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, had been set on the throne by Pharaoh Necho<sup>k</sup>, and so held with Egypt. And this is in reality the inference of modern critics. They bring the Chaldeans so close under the eyes of the prophet, that he could, by way of nature, foresee their invasion; and so much the closer under his eyes, the more deeply the prejudice, that there is no prophecy in the Biblical sense of the word, has taken root in them, and the more consistently they follow it out. 'Habakkuk prophesied under Jehoiakim, for,' so Jüger expresses himself, 'since Jehoiakim was on the side of the Egyptians, it was easy to foresee, that<sup>l</sup>; &c.' Just so Ewald; <sup>m</sup> 'One might readily be tempted to think, that Habakkuk wrote, while the pious king Josiah was still living; but since the first certain invasion of the Chaldeans, of which our account speaks<sup>n</sup>, falls within the reign of king Jehoiakim, somewhat between 608-604 B. C. we must abide by this date.' Hitzig defines the dates still more sharply, according to that principle of principles, to which history with its facts must adapt itself unconditionally. 'The prophet announces the arrival of the Chaldeans in Judæa, as something marvellous.' Well then, one would imagine, that it would follow from this, that at that time they had not yet come. But no! 'Habakkuk,' says Hitzig, 'introduces the Chaldeans as a new phenomenon, as yet entirely unknown; he prophesied accordingly at their first arrival into Palestine. But this beyond question falls in the reign of Jehoiakim<sup>o</sup>. In Jehoiakim's fourth year, i. e. 606, they had fought the battle at Carchemish; in 605 the Chaldean army seems to have been on its march; the writing of Habakkuk is placed most correctly in the beginning of the year 604,' accordingly, at the time, when the Chaldeans were already marching with all speed straight on Jerusalem, and (as Hitzig infers from Hab. i. 9.) after they had come down from the North along the coast, were now advancing from the West, when they, as Ewald too remarks (resting, like Maurer on i. 2-4), 'already stood in the holy land, trampling everything under foot with irresistible might, and allowing their own right alone to count as right.' Holding fast to that naturalist a priori, we go yet further. In ii. 17, the judgement of God is threatened to the Chaldean, on account of the violence practised on Lebanon, and the destruction of its animals. Lebanon is, it is said, the holy land; the animals, its inhabitants: in iii. 14, 17, the prophet sees the hostile hordes storming in: the devastation wrought through the war stands clearly before his eyes. This is not possible, unless the Chaldean were at that time already established in Judæa. However, then, c. i. was written before their invasion, yet c. ii., iii. must have been written after it. 'Wherefore,' says Maurer, 'since it is evident from Jer. xlv. 2, and xxxvi. 9, that the Chaldeans came in the year B. C. 605, in the 9th month of the 5th year of the reign of Jehoiakim, it follows that c. i. was written at that very time, but c. ii. iii. at the beginning of B. C. 604, the 6th of Jehoiakim.'

"Turn we away from this cheap pseudo-criticism, with its ready-made results, which sacrifices all sense for historical truth to a prejudice, which it seems to have vowed not to allow to be shaken by any thing. It seeks at any cost to disburden itself of any prophecy in Scripture, which can only present war," says a journal not wanting in self-reliance, "has gone far to verify the paradox, that nothing is certain but the unexpected. At any rate, nothing has happened but the unforeseen. Neither king nor Emperor, neither French nor German government or people had formed any anticipation of the events of the month now ending. The French expected to invade Germany, and they have been invaded themselves. The Germans, though confident of ultimate success, expected a long and toilsome conflict, whereas a month has brought them almost to the gates of Paris. The calculation of all parties as to the political effects of the war have been equally mistaken." The Times, Aug. 31st. And yet men, who, with our full information, would not risk a prediction as to the issue of things immediately before their eyes, think it so easy for Jewish prophets, living in their own small insulated country, to foretell certainly that Babylon would prevail over Egypt, when they knew either country only as their own superior, and political sagacity and feeling was on the side of Egypt.

<sup>e</sup> Dr. Davidson rightly says, "the spoiling and violence, there (i. 2, 3.) depicted, refer to the internal condition of the theocracy, not to external injuries" (p. 305); but then he contradicts himself and Jeremiah, when he says, (p. 305) following Ewald (Proph. ii. 30.), "The safest conclusion respecting the time of the prophet, is that he lived in the time of Jehoiakim (606-604. B. C.), when the kingdom of Judah was in a good moral condition, justice and righteousness having entered into the life of the people after Josiah's reforms, and idolatry having almost disappeared."

be explained through supernatural agency; and yet it attains its end, neither elsewhere nor in our prophet. Chapter ii. contains a prediction of the overthrow of the Chaldean empire and of the sins whereby that overthrow was effected, which has been so remarkably confirmed by history even in details, that that criticism, if it would be true to its principles, must assume that it was written while Cyrus, advancing against Babylon, was employed in punishing the river Gyndes by dividing it off into 360 channels."

This major premiss, "there can be no superhuman prediction of the future," (in other words, "Almighty God, if He knows the future, cannot disclose it!") still lurks under the assumptions of that modern school of so-called criticism. It seems to be held no more necessary, formally to declare it, than to enounce at full length any axiom of Euclid. Yet it may, on that very ground, escape notice, while it is the unseen mainspring of the theories, put forth in the name of criticism. "That Habakkuk falls at a later time," says Stähelin, "is clear out of his prophecy itself; for he speaks of the Chaldeans, and the controversy is only, whether he announces their invasion, as Knobel, Umbreit, Delitzsch, Keil<sup>a</sup> hold, or presupposes it, as Ewald, Hitzig, E. Meier maintain. To me the first opinion appears the right, since not only do i. 5. sqq. plainly relate to the future, but the detailed description of the Chaldeans points at something which has not yet taken place, at something hitherto unknown, and the terror of the prophet in announcing their coming, i. 12. sqq., recurs also iii. 1, 16, 17; and so, I think, that the time of Habakkuk's activity may be placed very soon after the battle of Carchemish, in the first half of the reign of Jehoiakim, and so his prophecy as contemporary with Jeremiah xxv." "Habakkuk," says De Wette, "lived and prophesied in the Chaldee period. It is, however, matter of dispute at what point of time in this period he lived. i. 5. sqq. clearly points to its beginning, the reign of Jehoiakim. Even ch. iii. seems to require no later point of time, since here the destruction of Judah is not yet anticipated. He was then Jeremiah's younger contemporary. Rightly do Perschke, Ranitz, Stiekel, Knobel, Hitzig, Ewald, let the prophet prophesy a little before the invasion of the Chaldeans in Judah, which the analogy of prophecy favours;" for prophecy may still be human at this date, since so far it foretells only, what any one could foresee. A prophet of God foretells, these critics admit, an invasion which all could foresee, and does not foretell, what could not humanly be foreseen, the destruction of Jerusalem. The theory then is saved, and within these limits Almighty God is permitted to send His prophet. Condescending criticism!

Mostly criticism kept itself within these limits, and used nothing more than its axiom, "there was no prophecy." The freshness and power of prophetic diction in Habakkuk deterred most from that other expedient of picking out some two or three words as indicative of a later style. Stähelin however says; "His language too, although on the whole pure and without Aramaisms," (truly so! since there is not even an alleged or imagined Aramaism in his prophecy,) "still betrays, in single cases, the later period." And then he alleges that 1) one verb<sup>1</sup> "only occurs besides in the books of Kings and in Ezekiel;" 2) another word "with the exception of Nahum, only in Jeremiah and Malachi;" 3) "the image of the cup of destiny only occurs in prophecies subsequent to Jeremiah." Marvellous precision of criticism, which can infer the date of a book from the facts, 1) that a verb, formed from a noun, occurs four times only in Holy Scripture, in 2 Kings, Habakkuk, and Ezekiel, whereas the noun from which it is derived occurs in a Psalm, which fits no later time than David's<sup>2</sup>; 2) that a word, slightly varied in pronunciation from a common Hebrew word<sup>3</sup>, occurs only in Nahum, Habakkuk, Jeremiah, and Malachi, once in each, when that word is the basis of the name of the river Pishon, mentioned in Genesis, and Stähelin himself places Nahum in the reign of Hezekiah; or that 3) no prophet before Jeremiah speaks of the image of the "cup of destiny," whereas the portion given by God for good<sup>4</sup> or for ill<sup>5</sup>, occurs under that same image in Psalms of David and Asaph; and if the question is to be begged as to the date of Isaiah li. 17, 22, the corresponding image of "drinking wine of reeling," occurs in a Psalm of David<sup>6</sup>, and being "drunk, but not with wine" is imagery of an earlier chapter in Isaiah<sup>7</sup>; the image occurs fully in Obadiah<sup>8</sup>.

Such criticism is altogether childish. No one would tolerate it, except that it is adduced to support a popular and foregone conclusion. It would be laughed to scorn, were it used by believers in revelation. In the small remains of the Hebrew Scriptures and language, an induction, if it is to be of any value, must be very distinct. The largeness of Greek literature enables critics to single out Homeric, Herodotean, Æschylean, Pindaric words. In Hebrew we meet with ἀπαξ λεγόμενα in perhaps every prophet, in many Psalms; but it requires far more than the occurrence of the word in one single place, to furnish any even probable inference, that it was framed by the Prophet or Psalmist himself. Still less can it be inferred safely that because, in the scanty remains of Hebrew, a word does not occur before e. g. a certain historical book, it did not exist before the date of that book. Rather the occurrence of any word in language so simple as that of the historical books, is an evidence that it did exist and was in common use at the time. Poets and orators coin words, in order to give full expression for their thoughts. The characteristic of the sacred historians, both of the Old and New Testament, is to relate the facts in most absolute simplicity. It would be a singular "history of the Hebrew language," which should lay down as a principle, that all

<sup>a</sup> Stähelin mixed up Delitzsch and Keil, who believed in superhuman prediction, and Knobel &c. who denied it, joining himself on to the class in general and ignoring the radical difference. Dr. Davidson assumes the same principle. "As he mentions the Chaldeans by name, and his oracle refers to them, he lived in the Chaldean period. —The safest conclusion respecting the time of the prophet is that he lived in the time of Jehoiakim (606-604, B. C.)." "To put the prophet in Manasse's reign is incorrect because the Chaldeans were not a people formidable to the Jews at that time." (Introd. iii. pp. 304, 305.) And so Habakkuk, without superhuman knowledge, could not foretell it!

<sup>1</sup> "Thus the verb עָלָה occurs, only besides in the books of Kings and in Ezekiel." Stähelin. "The diction is pure and classical. Yet he has some late words, as עָלָה i. 10, which appears only in Kings and Ezekiel." Dr. Davidson. The primitive form עָלָה, which is alleged, does not occur at all; only עָלָה Ez. xvi. 31. and עָלָה with ו, "mock at," 2 Kgs. ii. 23, Hab. i. 10, Ez. xxii. 5, as denominatives from עָלָה Ps. xlv. 14. lxxix. 4. and Jer. xx. 8. There is nothing to shew that it is a late word, though occurring for the first time in the history of Elisha. In Aramaic, (not in Onk. or Jon.) it has the opposite meaning, "praised." In the exceptions in Chaldee, Ges. seems rightly to conjecture, that it signifies ironical praise, as in Shem. rabba s. 27. In Ps. xlv. 14. עָלָה is retained for the Heb. עָלָה.

<sup>2</sup> "עָלָה i. 8. with the exception of Nah. iii. 18, only besides in Jeremiah and Malachi." Stähelin. "עָלָה i. 8. in Jeremiah and Malachi besides;" Dr. Davidson; who avoids the absurdity of arguing relative lateness of diction from a word, occurring in Nahum, by omitting this fourth instance, but therewith falsifying the facts before him.

<sup>4</sup> "The image of 'the cup of destiny' ii. 16, first occurs in the prophets after Jeremiah; and Hab. ii. 16. itself seems to refer to Jerem. xlix. 12." Stähelin pp. 288, 289. "The cup of judgement (ii. 16.) does not occur in the prophets before Jeremiah: whether Habakkuk refers in ii. 16. to Jer. xlix. 12. is doubtful, though Stähelin ventures to assert it;" Dr. Davidson (iii. 303) acknowledging, as usual, the source of his statements, where he dissents in one of them.

those are later words, which do not happen to occur before the books of Kings, Habakkuk, or any other prophet, whom this criticism is pleased to rank among the later books. What are we to do with Habakkuk's own ἀπαξ λεγόμενα? Granted, that he framed some of them, yet it is impossible that he framed them all. As specimens of the results of such a critical principle, that words, occurring for the first time in any book, are characteristic of the date of that word, let us only take roots beginning with s. Had then the Hebrew no name for nails (as distinct from hooks, pegs<sup>b</sup>) before those whom these critics would make late writers<sup>c</sup>, as Ecclesiastes and Isaiah xli? Or had they none for ceiling a building before the book of Kings<sup>d</sup>; although the ark had a third story<sup>e</sup>, and Lot speaks of "the shadow of my roof<sup>f</sup>?" Or had they none for a "decked vessel" before Jonah<sup>g</sup>, although the Indian names of Solomon's imports show that Ophir, whither his navy sailed, was in India, Ophir itself being Abhira in the province of Cutch<sup>h</sup>? Or had they no name for "divided opinions" before Elijah<sup>i</sup>? Seed shed, which sprang up in the second year, was known in the Pentateuch<sup>k</sup>; but that of the third year would, on that hypothesis, remain unknown till Hezekiah<sup>l</sup>; nor did the Hebrews express to "drag along the ground," till Hushai<sup>m</sup>, and, after him, Jeremiah. They had no name for winter, as distinct from autumn, until the Canticles<sup>n</sup>, and, but for the act of the Philistines in stopping up<sup>o</sup> Abraham's wells, it might have been said that Hebrew had no word for this act, till the time of Jehoshaphat<sup>p</sup>.

Or as to the criticism itself, סָחַק is to be a later word, because, except in that Psalm of the sons of Corah, it occurs first in the history of Elisha<sup>q</sup>. Perhaps it is so rare (and this may illustrate the history of Elisha) because, as used, it seems to have been one of the strongest words in the language for "derision;" at least the verb is used in an intensive form only, and always of strong derision<sup>r</sup>. But then, did the old Hebrews never use derision? Happy exception for one nation, if they never used it wrongly or had no occasion to use it rightly! Yet even though (by a rare exception) Ewald allows the second Psalm to be David's, (Job however being placed about the 7th century B. C.) the evidence for שָׁחַק, as strong a word, would be of the time of David<sup>s</sup>. "Scorning" "scuffling," (unless Psalm i. be allowed to be David's) did not begin till Solomon's time<sup>t</sup>. "Mocking" was yet later<sup>u</sup>. As belongs to a rude people, insult was only shewn in acts, of which חָתַל is used<sup>v</sup>; and from those simple times of the Patriarchs, they had no stronger word than "to laugh at<sup>w</sup>." For this is the only word used in the Pentateuch<sup>x</sup>.

But to what end all this? To prove that Habakkuk had no superhuman knowledge of what he foretold? Prophecy occupies, as I said, a subordinate place in Habakkuk. He renews the "burden" of former prophets, both upon his own people and upon the Chaldeans; but he does not speak even so definitely as they. His office is rather to enforce the connection of sin and punishment: he presupposes the details, which they had declared. Apart from those chapters, which pseudo-criticism denies to Isaiah<sup>y</sup>, on account of the distinctness of the temporal prophecies, Isaiah had, in plainest words, declared to Hezekiah the carrying away of all the royal treasures to Babylon, and that his offspring should be eunuchs there<sup>z</sup>; Micah had declared not only the complete desolation of Jerusalem<sup>aa</sup>, but that the people should be "b carried to Babylon, and there delivered, there redeemed from the hands of the enemy." In the 13th year of Josiah, B. C. 628. and so, three years before the fall of Nineveh, while Babylon was still dependent on Nineveh and governed by a vice-roy, and while Nabopolassar was still in the service of the king of Nineveh, Jeremiah foretold, that "evil should break forth from the North upon all the inhabitants of the land, and all the families of the kingdoms of the North shall come and set every one his throne at the entering of the gates of Jerusalem and against all the walls thereof round about and against all the cities of Judah, to execute the judgements of God against them for their wickedness." This was his dirge over his country for twenty three years<sup>ab</sup>, ere yet there was a token of its fulfilment. Babylon had succeeded to Nineveh in the West and South-West, and Judah had fallen to the share of Babylon; but the relation of Josiah to Nabopolassar was of a tributary sovereign, which rebellion only could disturb. The greater part of Nabopolassar's 21 year's reign are almost a blank<sup>ac</sup>. Chastisement had come, but from the South, not from the North. Eighteen years had passed away, and Josiah had fallen, in resisting Pharaoh-Necho in discharge of his fealty to the king of Babylon. Pharaoh-Necho had taken away one king of Judah, Jehoahaz, the people's choice, whose continued fealty to Babylon represents their minds, and had set up another, Jehoiakim. For three years Judah's new allegiance was allowed to continue. Who, but God, could tell the issue of the conflict of those two great armies at Carchemish? Egypt with her allies, the Ethiopians, Phut and Lud, were come, rising up like a flood<sup>ad</sup>, covering the earth with her armies, as her rivers, when swollen, made her own land one sea. Necho had apparently in his alliance all the kings of the countries West of the Euphrates: for to them all, in connection with Egypt and subordinate to her, does Jeremiah at that moment give to drink the cup of the wrath of God; to "Pharaoh king of Egypt, and his servants and his princes and all his people, and all the mingled people [his auxiliaries] and all the kings of the land of Uz, and all the kings of the land of the Philistines and Ashkelon and Azzah and Ekron and the remnant of Ashdod; Edom and Moab and the children of Ammon; and all the kings of Tyrus, and all the kings of Zidon and the kings of the isle beyond the sea [probably Caphtor<sup>b</sup>, or Crete, or Cyprus] Dedan and Tema and Buz, and those whose hair is shorn [Arabians<sup>c</sup>] and all the kings of Arabia and all the kings of the mingled people that dwell in the desert, and all the kings of Zimri [<sup>k</sup>descendants of Abraham and Keturah.] It was a mighty gathering. All the kings of Elam, all the kings of the Medes, all the kings of the North far and near, all was hostile to Babylon; for all were to drink of the cup beforehand, at the hands of the king of Babylon, and then the king of Sheshach [Babylon] was to drink after them. Necho was one of the most enterprising monarchs<sup>d</sup>. Nabopolassar had shewn no signs of enterprise. Nebuchadnezzar, the first and last conqueror of the Babylonian empire, though the alliance with Media and his father's empire had been cemented by his marriage, had, as far as we know, remained inactive during 20 years of his father's life<sup>e</sup>. He was as yet untried. So little did he himself feel secure as to his inheritance of the throne, even after his success at the head of his father's army, that his rapid march across the desert, with light troops, to secure it, and its preservation for him by the chief priest, are recorded in a very concise history<sup>f</sup>. Neither Egypt nor Jehoiakim foresaw the issue. Defeat taught neither. Two voices only gave, in God's name, one unheeded warning. Pharaoh Hophra, the Apries of Herodotus, succeeded Pharaoh Necho in his self-confidence, his aggressions, his defeat. "I am against thee," God says<sup>g</sup>, "Pharaoh, king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said, My river is mine own and I have made it for myself." "It is said," relates Herodotus<sup>h</sup>, "that Apries believed that there was not a god which could cast him down from his eminence, so firmly did he think that he had established himself in his kingdom."

For a time, Nebuchadnezzar must have been hindered by Eastern wars, since, on Jehoiakim's rebellion and perjury, he sent only hands of the Chaldees, with hands of tributary nations, the Syrians, Moabites, Ammonites, against him<sup>i</sup>. But not in his time only, even after the captivity under his son Jehoiachin and his men of might<sup>j</sup>, the conviction that Nebuchadnezzar could be resisted, still remained in the time of Zedekiah both in Egypt and Judah. Judah would have continued to hold under Babylonia that same position towards Egypt which it did under Persia, only with subordinate kings instead of governors. Apart from God's general promise of averting evil on repentance, Jeremiah, too, expressly tells Israel, "If thou wilt put away thine abominations out of My sight, thou shalt not remove;" "Then will I cause you to dwell in this place, in the land that I gave to your fathers, for ever and ever." And "in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim," "The Lord sent me to prophesy against this house and against this city all the words which ye have heard. Therefore now amend your ways and your doings and obey the voice of the Lord your God, and the Lord will repent Him of the evil that He hath pronounced against you."

Still later, to Zedekiah, "The nations that bring their neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon and serve him, them will I let remain still in their own land, saith the Lord; and they shall till it and dwell therein." "I have sent unto you all My servants the prophets, rising up early and sending them, saying, Return ye now every man from his evil way and amend your doings, and go not after other gods to serve them, and ye shall dwell in the land which I have given to you and to your fathers." Even on the very verge of the capture of Jerusalem, Jeremiah promised to Zedekiah<sup>k</sup>; "If thou wilt go forth to the king of Babylon's princes;—this city shall not be burned with fire." Pharaoh Hophra was still strong enough to raise the siege of Jerusalem, when invested by the Chaldean army<sup>l</sup>. Jeremiah had the king, his princes, his prophets, all the people of the land against him, because he prophesied that Jerusalem should be burned with fire, that those already taken captives should not return, until the whole had been carried away, and the seventy years of captivity were accomplished<sup>m</sup>. The warning and the promise of Jeremiah's inaugural vision had its accomplishment. "I have made thee a defenced city, and an iron pillar, and brazen walls, against the king of Judah, against the princes thereof and against the people of the land; and they shall fight against thee, but they shall not prevail against thee; for I am with thee, saith the Lord, to deliver thee." Had it been matter of human foresight, how was it, that all nations, all their politicians, all their wise men, all their prophets, all Judah, kings, priests, princes, people, were blinded, (as in Him of Whom Jeremiah was a shadow,) and Jeremiah alone saw? "Vaticinia post eventum" are, in one sense, easy; viz. to imagine, after an event has taken place, that one could have foreseen it. And yet who, after the retreat to Corunna, could have foreseen the victories of the Peninsular war? Or, when that tide of 647,000 men<sup>n</sup> was rolling on towards Russia, who could imagine that only a small fraction of those hosts should return, that they should capture Moscow, but find it a tomb; and hunger and cold, reaching at last to 36 degrees below Zero, should destroy more than the sword? "What was the principal adversary of this tremendous power? By whom was it checked and resisted and put down? By none and by nothing but the direct and manifest interposition of God."

The distinctness and perseverance of the prophecy are the more remarkable, because the whole of the greatness of the Chaldean empire was that of one man. Assyria, in this one case, overreached itself in its policy of transporting conquered populations. It had, probably to check the rebellions of Babylon, settled there a wild horde, which it hoped would neither assimilate with its people, nor itself rebel. Isaiah relates the fact in simple words: "Behold the land of the Chaldeans; this people was not; the Assyrian founded<sup>o</sup> it for them that dwell in the wilderness. This does not seem to me necessarily to imply, that the wild people, for whom Assyria founded it, were Chaldeans<sup>p</sup> or Curds, whom the king of Assyria had brought from their Northern dwellings in the Carduchæan mountains<sup>q</sup> near Armenia, where Sennacherib conquered. Isaiah simply uses the name, the land of the Chaldeans, as does Jeremiah<sup>1</sup> after him, as the name of Babylonia; the word Babylonia, had it existed, might have been substituted for it. Of this, he says, that it was not, i. e. was of no account<sup>2</sup>, but that Assur founded it for wild tribes, whom he placed there. Whence he brought those tribes, Isaiah does not say. Æschylus (although indeed in later times) as well as Isaiah and Jeremiah, speak of the population of Babylon, as mingled of various nations; and the language is too large to be confined simply to its merchant-settlers. In Æschylus<sup>3</sup>, "the all-mingled crowd," which "it sends out in long array," are its military contingents. It is its whole population, of which Isaiah and Jeremiah say, it will flee, each to his own land. "It [Babylon] shall be as a chased roe, and as a sheep which no man gathereth; they shall, every man, turn to his own people, and flee every man to his own land. For fear of the oppressing sword they shall turn every one to his people: "And they shall flee, every one to his own land.

Ps. civ. 8, Hab. i. 12, and the common use of אֲשׁוּר "founded a city, building, temple,") not that it should cease to be.

Thus Babylonia received that solid accession of strength which ultimately made it a powerful people, sixty years before the beginning of the reign of Josiah; its ancient and new elements would take some time to blend: they did not assume importance until the capture of Nineveh; nor had Judah any reason to dread any thing from them, until itself rebelled, early in the reign of Jehoiakim. But 18 years before the death of Josiah, while Judah was a trusted and faithful tributary kingdom, Jeremiah foretold that evil should come upon them from the North, i. e. as he himself explains it, from the Chaldees<sup>4</sup>. Even then if Habakkuk were brought down to be a contemporary of Jeremiah, still in the 13th year of Josiah, there was nothing to fear. Judah was not in the condition of an outlying country, which Babylonian ambition might desire to reduce into dependence on itself. It was already part of the Babylonian empire, having passed into it, in the partition with Assyria, and had no more to fear from it, than any of the conquered nations of Europe have now from those who have annexed them, unless they rebel. God alone knew the new ambition of the kings of the smitten and subdued Egypt, their momentary success, Josiah's death, Judah's relapse into the old temptation of trusting in Egypt—all, conditions of the fulfilment of Habakkuk's and Jeremiah's prophecies. Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, Zidon, sent ambassadors to Zedekiah, to concert measures of resistance against Nebuchadnezzar<sup>5</sup>; they were encouraged by their "diviners, dreamers, enchanter, sorcerers, which spake to them, ye shall not serve the king of Babylon." One alone told them that resistance would but bring upon them destruction, that submission was their only safety; there was prophecy against prophecy<sup>6</sup>; among these nations, in Jerusalem, in Babylon<sup>7</sup>; the recent knowledge of the political aspect of Babylon deterred not the false prophets there; all, with one voice, declared the breaking the yoke of the king of Babylon: Jeremiah only saw, that they were framing for themselves "yokes of iron. Had Jehoiakim or Zedekiah, their nobles, and their people possessed that human foresight which that pseudo-critical school holds to be so easy, Judah had never gone into captivity to Babylon. But He Who fashioneth the heart of man knoweth alone the issue of the working of those hearts, which He over-rules.

From the necessity of its case, the pseudo-critical school lowers down the words, in which Habakkuk declares the marvellousness of the event which he foretells, and the unbelief of his people. "Look well," he bids them, "marvel ye, marvel on; for I will work a work in your days which ye will not believe, when it shall be told you." It is "something which had not hitherto been, something hitherto unknown," says Stahelin<sup>8</sup>. Yet things hitherto unknown, are not therefore incredible. "It is clear from the contents," says Bleek<sup>9</sup>, "that the Chaldees had at that time already extended to the West their expeditions of conquest and destruction, and on the other side, that this had only lately begun and that they were not yet come to Judah and Jerusalem, so that here they were hitherto little known." "The appearance of the Chaldees as world-conquerors was, in Judah, then a quite new phenomenon," says Ewald<sup>10</sup>. "The description of the Chaldees altogether is of such sort, that they appear as a people still little known to the Jews," says Knobel<sup>11</sup>. "That which is incredible for the people consists therein, that God employs just the Chaldees, such as they are described in what follows, for the unexpected chastisement of Israel," says even Umbreit<sup>12</sup>.

What was there incredible, that, when the king of Jerusalem had revolted from Babylon, and had sided with Egypt, its chief enemy, the Chaldeans, should come against it? As soon might it be said to be incredible that France should invade Prussia, when its hundred thousands were on their march towards the Rhine. During the reign of Manasseh it was incredible enough, that any peril should impend from Babylon; for Babylon was still subordinate to Assyria: in the early years of Josiah it was still incredible, for his thirty-one years were years of peace, until Pharaoh Necho disputed the cis-Euphratensian countries with Babylon. When the then East and West came to Carchemish, to decide whether the empire should be with the East or with the West, nothing was beyond human foresight but the result. Expectation lately hung suspended, perplexed between the forces of Europe. None, the most sagacious, could predict for a single day. Men might surmise; God only could predict. For three and twenty years Jeremiah foretold, that the evil would come from the North, not from the South. The powers were well-balanced. Take Habakkuk's prophecy as a whole—not that the Chaldeans should invade Judæa, (which in Jehoiakim's time was already certain) but that Egypt should be a vain help, and that the Chaldeans should mesh its people like the fishes of the sea, yet they should still have to disgorge them, because God's judgement would come upon them also. This too were incredible. Incredible it was to the kings, the wise, the politicians, the political prophets of Judæa, that Jerusalem itself should be taken. Incredible it was, and there was much human reason for the incredulity. Egypt and Assyria had been matched during centuries. Until the Sargo-

<sup>6</sup> There ought to be no question as to the identity of the invasion from the north, Jer. i. 15, vi. 22, x. 22, and Jeremiah's own summary of his prophecies from the 18th. of Josiah, xxv. 3-9 when he names Nebuchadnezzar: only then there would be definite prediction. Hence the mar's nest as to the dread of the Scythians, who marched

nides, Egypt had, during centuries, the unbroken advantage. But the Sargonides had passed away. Yet Chaldæa had not, alone, prevailed against Assyria. Why should the yet untried Babylonian be so certain of success, when the whole West of the Euphrates was banded together against him, and fought within their own ground? The kings of Elam and the kings of the Medes<sup>a</sup> were now, as under Cyrus, enemies of Babylon. Babylon had enemies before and behind. But God had raised up Nebuchadnezzar to be the hammer of the whole earth<sup>b</sup>, and had given those cis-Euphratensian lands which leagued against him into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, My servant, God says<sup>c</sup>, and all nations shall serve him and his son and his son's son, until the very time of his land come; and then many nations and great kings shall serve themselves of him. Whence this combination of almost superhuman but short-lived might, this certainty of wide sway down to the third generation, this certainty of its cessation afterwards? There was no time for decay. Alexander's empire was yet more short-lived, but it was divided among his successors. Alexander had, by his genius, founded his own empire, which the able generals, whom he had trained, divided among themselves. In the Chaldæan empire, we have an enterprising conspirator, who seizes an occasion, but does little besides which is recorded, nothing alone, nothing, besides that first grasp at power, for himself. He appears only as the ally of Media<sup>d</sup>: then a son, a world-wide conqueror, with a genius for consolidating the empire which he inherited, forming an impregnable city, which should also be a province, filling his empire with fortresses<sup>e</sup>, but leaving none after him to maintain what he had so consolidated. By whom could this be foreknown save by Him, with Whom alone it is, to root out and to pull down and to destroy and to throw down, to build and to plant<sup>f</sup>?

It has been common to praise the outside of Habakkuk's prophecy, the purity of his language, the sublimity of his imagery. Certainly it is, humanly speaking, magnificent: his measured cadence is impressive in its simplicity. He too has words and forms, which are peculiar to him among the remains of Hebrew<sup>1</sup>. But his eminence is rather the condensed thought, expressed often in the simplest words; as when, having carried on the tide of victory of the Chaldæan to its height, every thing human subdued before him, all resistance derided, he gathers up his fall and its cause in those eight words, "Then sweeps-he-by, wind, and-passes, and-is-guilty; this his-strength (is) his-god." Yet more striking is the religious greatness, in which he sums up the meaning of all this oppressiveness of man. "Thou, Lord, hast placed him for judgement, and, O Rock, hast founded him to correct." Or, take the picture, prolonged relatively to his conciseness, of the utter helplessness of God's people, meshed, hooked, dragged in their net; their captors worshipping the instrument of their success, revelling in their triumph, and then the sudden question, "Shall they therefore empty their net?" He waits to hear the answer from God. Or, again, the antipathetic dirge of the materials of the blood-built city over him<sup>2</sup>. Or the cutting off of every stay, sustenance, hope, promise of God, and, amid this universal crash, what does he? It is not as the heathen, "fearless will the ruins strike him:" but, "And I," as if it were the continuance and consequence of the failure of all human things; "I would exult in the Lord, I would bound for joy in the God of my salvation." His faith triumphs most, when all, in human sight, is lost.

"H which Thou blessest is most good,
And unblest good is ill;
And all is right which seems most wrong,
So it be Thy sweet Will."

CHAPTER I.

1 Unto Habakkuk, complaining of the iniquity of the land, 5 is shewed the fearful vengeance by the Chaldeans. 12 He complaineth that vengeance should be executed by them who are far worse.

CHAP. I., Ver. 1. The burden<sup>1</sup> which Habakkuk the prophet did see. The prophet's name signifies "strong embrace." The word in its intensive form is used both of God's enfolding the soul in His tender supporting love<sup>2</sup>, and of man clinging and holding fast to Divine wisdom<sup>3</sup>. It fits in with the subject of his prophecy, faith, cleaving fast to God amid the perplexities of things seen. "He who is spiritually Habakkuk, cleaving fast to God with the arms of love, or enfolding Him after the manner of one holily wrestling, until he be blessed, enlightened, and heard by Him, is the seer here." "Let him who would in such wise fervidly embrace God and plead with Him as a friend, praying earnestly for the deliverance and consolation of himself and others, but who sees not as yet, that his prayer is heard, make the same holy plaint, and appeal to the clemency of the Creator." "He is called 'embrace' either because of his love to the Lord; or because he engages in a contest and strife and (so to speak) wrestling with God. For no one with words so bold ventured to challenge God to a discussion of His justice and to say to Him, 'Why, in human affairs and the government of this world is there so great injustice?'"

The prophet. The title, the prophet, is added only to the names of Habakkuk, Haggai, Zechariah. Habakkuk may the rather have added it to his name, because prominently he expostulates with God, like the Psalmists, and does not speak in the name of God to the people. The title asserts that he exercised the pastoral office of the prophets, although not directly in this prophecy<sup>4</sup>.

Did see. "God multiplied visions, as is written<sup>5</sup>, and Himself spake to the prophets, disclosing to them beforehand what should be, and all but exhibiting them to sight, as if already present. But that they determined not to speak from their own, but rather transmit to us the words from God, he persuades us at the outset, naming himself a Prophet, and shewing himself full of the grace belonging thereto."

2. O Lord, how long shall I cry, lit. how long have I cried so intensely to Thee<sup>6</sup>? For it is ever the cry of the creature to Him Who alone can hear or help, its God<sup>7</sup>. Of this cry the Prophet expresses that it had already lasted long. In that long past had he cried to God and no change had come. There is an undefined past, and this still continues<sup>8</sup>. How long, as Asaph cries, how long hast Thou been, and, it is implied, wilt Thou be wroth against the prayer of Thy people? as we should say, how long shall Thy wrath continue? The words which the Prophet uses relate to domestic strife and wrong between man and man; violence<sup>9</sup>, iniquity, strife, contention<sup>10</sup>, nor are any of them used only of the oppression of a foreign enemy. He complains too of injustice too strong for the law, and the perversion of justice<sup>11</sup>. And on this the sentence is pronounced. The enemy is to be sent for judgement and correction<sup>12</sup>. They are then the sins of Judah which the Prophet rehearses before God, in fellow-suffering with the oppressed. God answers that they shall be removed, but by the punishment of the sinners.

Punishment does not come without sin, nor does sin endure without punishment. It is one object of the Old Testament to exhibit the connection between sin and punishment. Other prophets, as commissioned by God, first denounced the sins and then foretold the punishment of the impenitent. Habakkuk appeals to God's justice, as requiring its infliction. On this ground too this opening of the prophecy cannot be a complaint against the Chaldees, because their wrong would be no ground of the punishment which the prophet denounced, but the punishment itself, requiting wrong to man through human wrong.

"The prophet considers the person of the oppressed, enduring the intolerable insolence and contumely of those wonted to do wrong, and very skilfully doth he attest the unutterable loving kindness of God. For he exhibits Him as very forbearing, though wont to hate wickedness. But that He doth not forthwith bring judgement on the offenders, he showed clearly, saying that so great is His silence and long-suffering, that there needeth a strong cry, in that some practise intolerable covetousness against others, and use an unbridled insolence against the weak. For his very complaints of God's endurance of evil attest the immeasurable loving kindness of God."

"You may judge hence of the hatred of evil in the Saints. For they speak of the woes of others as their own. So saith the most wise Paul, who is weak and I am not weak? who is offended, and I burn not? and bade us weep with those who weep, shewing that sympathy and mutual love are especially becoming to the saints."

The Prophet, through sympathy or fellow-suffering with the sufferers, is as one of them. He cries for help, as himself needing it, and being in the misery, in behalf of which he prays. He says, How long shall I cry? standing, as it were, in the place of all, and gathering all their cries into one, and presenting them before God. It is the cry, in one, of all which is wronged to the God of Justice, of all suffering to the God of love. "When shall this scene of sin, and confusion, and wrong be at an end, and the harmony of God's creation be restored? How long shall evil not exist only, but prevail?" It is the cry of the souls under the altar<sup>13</sup>, How long, O Lord, Holy and True, dost Thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth? It is the voice of the oppressed against the accept the persons of the ungodly?" "Judgement goes forth perverted in the seat of man's judgement (the soul), when, bribed by the pleasures of sense, it leans to the side of things seen, and the Ungodly one, the rebel angel, besets and overpowers him who has the sense of right; for it is right that things seen should give way to things unseen; <sup>2</sup> for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal." Why then all this? and how long? Why does God bring it before him and He Who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, behold grievance, which His Holy Eyes could not endure? Neither the Unseen Presence of God nor the mission of the Prophet checks. If he rebuke, no one hearkened; if he intercedes for sinners, or against sin, God made as though He would not hear. God answers that, though to man's impatience the time seems long, judgement shall come, and that, suddenly and speedily. While the righteous is enquiring, how long? and the wicked is saying<sup>3</sup>, My Lord delayeth His coming. He is come, and seen in the midst of them.

The whole tone of the words suddenly changes. The Jews flattered themselves that, being the people of God, He would not fulfil His threats upon them. They had become like the heathen in wickedness; God bids them look out among them for the instrument of His displeasure. It was an aggravation of their punishment, that God, Who had once chosen them, would now choose these whom He had not chosen, to chasten them. So Moses had foretold; <sup>4</sup> They have moved Me to jealousy by that which is not God; they have provoked Me to anger with their vanities; and I will move them to jealousy with not-a-people, I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation. There were no tokens of the storm which should sweep them away, yet on the horizon. No forerunners yet. And so He bids them gaze on among the nations, to see whence it should come. They might have expected it from Egypt. It should come whence they did not expect, with a fierceness and terribleness which they imagined not. Regard, look narrowly, weigh well what it portends; and wonder marvellously; lit. be amazed, amazed. The word is doubled<sup>5</sup>, to express how amazement should follow upon amazement; when the first was passing away, new source of amazement should come; for <sup>6</sup> I will work a work in your days, which ye will not believe, though it be told you. So incredible it will be, and so against their wills! He does not say, "ye would not believe if it were told you;" much less, "if it were told you of others;" in which case the chief thought would be left unexpressed. No condition is expressed. It is simply foretold, what was verified by the whole history of their resistance to the Chaldees until the capture of the city; "Ye will not believe, when it shall be told you." So it ever is. Man never believes, that God is in earnest, until His judgements come. So it was before the flood, and to Sodom, and Lot's sons-in-law; so it was to Ahab and Jezebel; so as to this destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, and that which is shadowed forth, by the Romans. So Jeremiah complained, <sup>7</sup> They have belied the Lord, and said, it is not He; neither shall evil come upon us; neither shall we see sword nor famine, and, <sup>8</sup> I am in derision daily; every one see mocketh me. For since I spake, I cried out, I cried violence and spoil; because the word of the Lord was made a reproach unto me, and a derision daily; and Isaiah, <sup>9</sup> Who hath believed our report? and St. John Baptist speaks as though it were desperate; <sup>10</sup> O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? and our Lord tells them, <sup>11</sup> Your house is left unto you desolate. And yet they believed not, but delivered Him up to be put to death, lest that should be, which did come, because they put Him to death. <sup>12</sup> If we let Him thus alone, all men will believe on Him; and the Romans shall come, and take away both our place and nation. St. Paul<sup>13</sup>, then, applies these words to the Jews in his day, because the destruction of the first temple by Nebuchadnezzar was an image of the destruction of the second (which by Divine appointment, contrary to man's intention, took place on the same day<sup>14</sup>), and the Chaldeans were images of the Romans, that second Babylon, heathen Rome; and both foreshowed the worse destruction by a fiercer enemy, the enemy of souls, the spiritual wasting and desolation which came on the Jew first, and which shall come on all who disobey the Gospel. So it shall be to the end. Even now the Jews believe not, whose work their own dispersion is; His, Who by them was crucified, but Who hath <sup>15</sup> all power in heaven and in earth. The Day of Judgement will come like a thief in the night to those who believe not or obey not our Lord's words.

6. For lo. So God announces a future, in which His Hand shall be greatly visible, whether more or less distant. In His sight it is present. I raise up. God uses the freewill and evil passions of men or devils to His own ends; and so He is said to raise up<sup>16</sup> those whom He allows to be stirred up against His people, since the events which His Providence permits, favour their designs, and it rests with Him to withhold them. They lift themselves up for some end of covetousness or pride. But there is a higher order of things, in which God orders their actions to fulfil by their iniquities His righteousness. The Chaldeans, that bitter<sup>17</sup> and hasty<sup>18</sup> nation. "To its might and warlike boldness almost all the Greeks who have written histories of the barbarians, witness." Which shall march through the breadth of the land,

All before it, is one wide even plain which it overspreads and covers, like a flood, and yet is not spent nor exhausted. To possess the dwelling-places that are not theirs. As God's people had done, so should it be done to them. Spoiling and violence within<sup>3</sup> attract oppression from without. The overcharged atmosphere casts down the lightning upon them. They had expelled the weak from their dwelling<sup>4</sup>; others shall possess theirs. Yet this scourge too shall pass by, since, although the Chaldean did God's Will, he willed it not, but his own<sup>5</sup>. The words, not theirs, lit. not to him [to-lo]<sup>6</sup> stand with a mysterious fulness of meaning. The dwelling places not being his by right, shall not remain his, although given to him, while God wills.

7. They are terrible<sup>7</sup> and dreadful. He describes them, first in themselves, then in act. They are terrible, and strike fear through their very being, their known character, before they put it forth in act. Their judgement and their dignity shall proceed of themselves. Judgement had gone forth in God's people wrested<sup>8</sup>; now shall it go forth against them at the mere will of their master, who shall own no other rule or Lord or source of his power. His own will shall be his only law for himself and others. His elevation<sup>9</sup> too is, in his own thought, from himself. He is self-sufficing; he holds from no other, neither from God nor man. His dignity is self-sustained; his judgement irresponsible, as if there were none<sup>10</sup> higher than he. He has, like all great world-powers, a real dignity and majesty. He infuses awe. The dignity is real but faulty, as being held independently of God. This is a character of Anti-christ<sup>11</sup>, a lawless insolence, a lifting up of himself.

Such had their own judges been<sup>16</sup>, and by such should they be punished. The horse partakes of the fierceness of his rider in trampling down the foe<sup>17</sup>. Their horsemen shall spread themselves [lit. widespread are their horsemen], and their horsemen from far shall come. Neither distance of march shall weary them, nor diffusion weaken them. So should Moses' prophecy be again fulfilled. <sup>18</sup>The Lord shall raise against thee a nation from far, from the ends of the earth, as the eagle flieth; a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand; a nation of fierce countenance, which shall not regard the person of the old, nor show favour to the young.

They shall fly as the eagle that hasteth [lit. hasting<sup>19</sup>] to eat, <sup>20</sup>not to fight, for none shall withstand; but with a course like the eagle's, to whom all fowl are subdued, hasting but to eat. Behold, Jeremiah says of Nebuchadnezzar<sup>21</sup>, he shall fly as an eagle and spread his wings over Moab; and, he repeats the words,<sup>22</sup> over Bozrah. Our pursuers, Jeremiah says<sup>23</sup>, are swifter than the eagles of the heavens. Ezekiel likens him to <sup>24</sup>a great eagle with great wings full of feathers; in Daniel's vision he is <sup>25</sup>a lion with eagle's wings.

9. They shall come all for violence. Violence had been the sin of Judah<sup>26</sup>, and now shall be her punishment. It had been ever before the prophet; all were full of it. Now should violence be the very end, one by one, of all the savage horde poured out upon them; they all, each one of them<sup>27</sup>, come for violence. Their faces shall sup up<sup>28</sup> as the east wind<sup>29</sup>. "As at the breath of the burning wind all green things dry up, so at sight of these all shall be wasted." They shall sweep over every thing impetuously, like the east wind, scorching, blackening, blasting, swallowing up all, as they pass over, as the East wind, especially in the Holy Land, sucks up all moisture and freshness. And they shall gather the captivity [i. e. the captives] as the sand, countless, as the particles which the Thence A. E. obtains the meaning "before, straight on," quoting Targ. Abulwalid, followed by Tanchum, compares the Arab. ḥār, "purposed," and thence derives the meaning "direction." The Arab. ḥār (appetivit, Fr.) signifies "approached" not "desired." Yet "forwards" is just as insulated a rendering as that adopted by J. and D. Kim., A. E., Rashi, Oh Sip., Sal. B. Mel. Arab Tr. (following Jon.) 10 And they shall scoff at the kings, and the princes shall be a scorn unto them: they shall deride every strong hold; for they shall heap dust, and take it.

East wind raises, sweeping over the sand-wastes, where it buries whole caravans in one death.

10. And they [lit. he, the word stands emphatically, he, alone against all the kings of the earth] shall scoff at the kings and all their might, taking them away or setting them up at his pleasure and caprice, subduing them as though in sport<sup>1</sup>; and princes, (lit. grave and majestic) shall be a scorn unto them [him]<sup>2</sup>. So Nebuchadnezzar bound Jehoiakim<sup>3</sup> in fetters to carry him to Babylon; then, on his submission made him for three years a tributary king<sup>4</sup>, then on his rebellion sent bands of Chaldees and other tributaries against him<sup>5</sup>; and then, or when Nebuchadnezzar took Jehoiachin, Jeremiah's prophecy was fulfilled, that he should be buried with the burial of an ass, dragged and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem<sup>6</sup>, his dead body cast out in the day to the heat and in the night to the frost<sup>7</sup>, then Nebuchadnezzar took away Jehoiachin; then Zedekiah. He had also many kings captive with him in Babylon. For on his decease Evil-Merodach brought Jehoiachin out of his prison after 27 years of imprisonment, and set his throne above the throne of the kings that were with him in Babylon<sup>8</sup>. Daniel says also to Nebuchadnezzar<sup>9</sup>, Thou, O king, art a king of kings: for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power and strength and glory. And wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field and the fowls of heaven hath He given into thine hand and hath made thee ruler over all.

They [he] shall deride every strong hold, as, aforetime, when God helped her, Jerusalem laughed the Assyrian to scorn<sup>10</sup>; for they [he] shall heap dust, and take it, as Nebuchadnezzar did Tyre, whose very name (Rock) betokened its strength. <sup>11</sup> He shall come to Tyre, and, casting a mound in the sea, shall make an island a peninsula, and, amid the waves of the sea, land shall give an entrance to the city."

The mount, or heaped-up earth, by which the besiegers fought on a level with the besieged, or planted their engines at advantage, was an old and simple form of siege, especially adapted to the great masses of the Eastern armies. It was used in David's time<sup>12</sup>; and by the Assyrians<sup>13</sup>, Egyptians<sup>14</sup>, Babylonians<sup>15</sup>, and afterwards the Persians<sup>16</sup>. Here he describes the rapidity of the siege. To heap up dust and to capture were one.

It needed no great means; things slight as the dust sufficed in the hands of those employed by God. Portion by portion, <sup>17</sup> the King of Babylon took all that pertained to the king of Egypt, from the river of Egypt unto the river Euphrates.

sweeps by<sup>18</sup>, a wind<sup>19</sup>, and passes<sup>20</sup>, and is guilty; this his strength is his god. The victory was completed, all resistance ended. He sweeps by, as his own Euphrates, when over-filled by the swelling<sup>21</sup> of all its tributary streams, riseth up over all its banks, and overwhelms all where it passes; as a wind which sweepeth<sup>22</sup> over the desert: and passes over all bounds and laws, human and Divine, and is guilty and stands guilty before God, making himself as God, This his power is his god. God had said to Israel, <sup>23</sup> I will be to thee God. The Chaldean virtually said, this my strength is to me my god. This Nebuchadnezzar's own words speak; <sup>24</sup> Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty? And the statue which was to be worshipped, was, very probably, of himself<sup>25</sup>, as the intoxication of pride has made other heathen kings or conquerors, Alexander or Darius<sup>26</sup>. Belshazzar said, <sup>27</sup> I will be like the Most High, and the prince of Tyre said, <sup>28</sup> I am a god, and Anti-Christ shall<sup>29</sup> exalt himself above all that is called god, and, as God, sit in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is god. Such is all pride. It sets itself in the place of God, it ceases to think itself His instrument, and so is a god to itself, as though its eminence and strength were its own, and its wisdom the source of its power<sup>30</sup>, and its will the measure of its greatness. The words, with a Divine fulness, express severally, that the king shall sweep along, shall pass over all bounds and all hindrances, and shall pass away, shall be guilty and shall bear his guilt<sup>31</sup>; and so they comprise in one his sin and his punishment, his greatness and his fall. And so forty years afterwards Nebuchadnezzar, <sup>32</sup> whom he would, he slew; and whom he would, he kept alive; and whom he would, he set up; and whom he would, he put down; but when his heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne, and they took his glory from him; <sup>33</sup> there fell a voice from heaven, The kingdom is departed from thee; and Belshazzar, <sup>34</sup> in the same night that he lifted up himself against the Lord of heaven, was slain.

12. The prophet, having summed up the deeds of the enemy of God in this his end, sets forth his questions anew. He had appealed against the evil of the wicked of his people; he had been told of the vengeance by the Chaldeans. <sup>35</sup> But the vengeance is executed by them who are far worse. How then? The answer is, "Wait to the end, and thou shalt see." What remains are the triumphs of faith; the second chapter closes with the entire prostration of the whole world before God, and the whole prophecy with joyous trust in God amid the entire failure of all outward signs of hope. Here, like the Psalmists<sup>1</sup> and Jeremiah<sup>2</sup>, he sets down at the very beginning his entire trust in God, and so, in the name of all who at any time shall be perplexed about the order of God's judgements, asks how it shall be, teaching us that the only safe way of enquiring into God's ways is by setting out with a living conviction that they <sup>3</sup>are mercy and truth. And so the address to God is full of awe and confidence and inward love. For "God placeth the oil of mercy in the vessel of trustfulness."

Art not Thou (the word has always an emphasis) Thou, and not whatsoever or whosoever it be that is opposed to Thee, (be it Nebuchadnezzar or Satan) from everlasting lit. from before<sup>5</sup>? Go back as far as man can in thought, God was still before; and so, much more before any of His creatures, such as those who rebel against Him. O Lord, it is the Proper Name of God, <sup>6</sup>Which is and Which was and Which is to come, I AM, the Unchangeable; my God, i. e., whereas his own might is (he had just said) the heathen's god, the Lord is his; mine Holy One:—one word, denoting that God is his God, sufficeth him not, but he adds (what does not elsewhere occur) mine Holy One, in every way, as hallowing him and hallowed by him: "<sup>7</sup>Who hallowest my soul, Holy in Thine Essence, and Whom as incomparably Holy I worship in holiness." All-Holy in Himself, He becometh the Holy One of him to whom He imparteth Himself, and so, by His own gift, belongeth, as it were, to him. The one word in Hebrew wonderfully fits in with the truth, that God becomes one with man by taking him to Himself. It is full of inward trust too, that he saith, "my God, my Holy One," as S. Paul saith, <sup>8</sup>Who loved me, and gave Himself for me, i. e., as S. Augustine explains it, "<sup>9</sup>O Thou God Omnipotent, Who so carest for every one of us, as if Thou caredst for him only; and so for all, as if they were but one." The title, my Holy One, includes his people with himself; for God was his God, primarily because he was one of the people of God; and his office was for and in behalf of his people. It involves then that other title which had been the great support of Isaiah<sup>10</sup>, by which he at once comforted his people, and impressed upon them the holiness of their God, the holiness which their relation to their God required, the Holy One of Israel. Thence, since Habakkuk lived, for his people with himself, on this relation to God, as my God, my Holy One, and that God, the Unchangeable; it follows, "We shall not die"<sup>11</sup>. There is no need of any mark of inference, "therefore we shall not die." It is an inference, but it so lay in those titles of God, He Is, My God, My Holy One, that it was a more loving confidence to say directly, we shall not die. The one thought involved the other. God, the Unchangeable, had made Himself their God. It was impossible, then, that He should cast them off or that they should perish. We shall not die, is the lightning thought of faith, which flashes on the soul like all inspirations of God, founded on His truth and word, but borne in, as it were, instinctively without inference on the soul, with the same confidence as the Psalmist says<sup>12</sup>, The Lord hath chastened me sore; but He hath not given me over unto death; and Malachi, <sup>13</sup>I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed. "<sup>14</sup>Thou createdst us from the beginning; by Thy mercy we are in being hitherto." Thy gifts and calling are without repentance<sup>15</sup>. "Did we look to his might; none of us could withstand him. Look we to Thy mercy, Thine alone is it that we live, are not slain by him, nor led to deeds of death." O Lord, again he repeats the Name of God, whereby He had revealed Himself as their God, the Unchangeable; Thou, whose mercies fail not, hast ordained them for judgement, not for vengeance or to make a full end, or for his own ends and pleasure, but to correct Thine own <sup>16</sup>in measure, which he, exceeding, sinned<sup>17</sup>.

And O mighty God [lit. Rock]. It is a bold title. My rock is a title much used by David<sup>18</sup>, perhaps suggested by the fastnesses amid which he passed his hunted life, to express, that not in them but in His God was his safety. Habakkuk purposely widens it. He appeals to God, not only as Israel's might and upholder, but as the sole Source of all strength, the Supporter of all which is upheld<sup>19</sup>, and so, for the time, of the Chaldaean too. Hence he continues the simple image: Thou hast founded him. "<sup>20</sup>Thou hast made him to stand firm as the foundation of a building;" to reprove or set before those who have sinned against Thee, what they had done. Since then God was the Rock, Who had founded them, from Him Alone had they strength; when He should withdraw it, they must fall. How then did they yet abide, who abused the power given them and counted it their own? And this the more, since

<sup>11</sup> The "tikkune sopherim" or so-called "corrections of the scribes" I think, appear to almost any one who examines them, not to imply any correction of the text of Holy Scripture, but as meant to suggest what would have come naturally into the mind of the writer, unless for some reason he had chosen what stands written. Thus here, the obvious contrast to "Thou art of old;" might be, (they would say) "Thou wilt continue to be;" "Thou wilt not die," לא תמות; but since it were unbecoming to speak of death in regard to God, even in denying it, the prophet said לא נמות, "we shall not die." But no thoughtful Jewish critic could ever have believed that Habakkuk could have said to God, Thou wilt not die. It would also, while irreverent to God, have omitted the whole consolation to his people. Of Jewish Commentators, Kim., A. E., Abarb. Tanch., do not think it worth while to allude to the correction; Sal. B. Melech

answer it more strongly. All sin is hateful in God's sight, and in His Holy Wisdom He cannot endure to look towards iniquity. As man turns away from sickening sights, so God's abhorrence of wrong is pictured by His not being able to look towards it. If He looked towards them, they must perish<sup>1</sup>. Light cannot co-exist with darkness, fire with water, heat with cold, deformity with beauty, foulness with sweetness, nor is sin compatible with the Presence of God, except as its Judge and punisher. Thou canst not look. There is an entire contradiction between God and unholiness. And yet, wherefore lookest Thou upon, viewest, as in Thy full sight<sup>2</sup>, yea, as it would seem, with favour<sup>3</sup>, bestowing on them the goods of this life, honour, glory, children, riches, as the Psalmist saith;<sup>4</sup> Behold these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world, they increase in riches? Why lookest thou upon them that deal treacherously, holdest Thy tongue, puttest restraint<sup>5</sup>, as it were, upon Thyself and Thine own attribute of Justice, when the wicked devoureth the man that is more righteous than he?<sup>6</sup> In God's sight no man living can be justified; and in one sense Sodom and Gomorrah were less unrighteous than Jerusalem, and <sup>7</sup> it shall be more tolerable for them in the day of Judgement, because they sinned against less light; yet the actual sins of the Chaldee were greater than those of Jerusalem, and Satan's evil is greater than that of those who are his prey. To say that Judah was more righteous than the Chaldean does not imply any righteousness of the Chaldean, as the saying that <sup>8</sup> God ransomed Jacob from the hand of one stronger than he, does not imply any strength remaining to Israel. Then, also, in all the general judgements of God, the righteous too suffer in this world, whence Abraham intercedes for Sodom, if there were but ten righteous in it; lest <sup>9</sup> the righteous be destroyed with the wicked. Hence God also spared Nineveh in part as having <sup>10</sup> more than sixscore thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand, i. e. good from evil. No times were fuller of sin than those before the destruction of Jerusalem, yet the fury of the Assassins fell upon the innocent. And so the words, like the voice of the souls under the Altar<sup>11</sup>, become the cry of the Church at all times against the oppressing world, and of the blood of the Martyrs from Abel to the end, Lord, how long? And in that the word Righteous<sup>12</sup> signifies both "one righteous man," and the whole class or generation of the righteous, it speaks both of Christ the Head and of all His members in whom (as by Saul) He was persecuted. The wicked also includes all persecutors, both those who slew the Lord Christ, and those who brought His servants before judgement-seats, and blasphemed His Name<sup>13</sup>, and caused many to blaspheme, and slew whom they could not compel. And God, all the while, seemeth to look away and to regard not.

<sup>15</sup>. They take up all of them [lit. he taketh up all of it] the whole race as though it were one, with an angle; they catch them, [lit. he sweepeth it away] in their [his] net. One fisherman is singled out who partly by wiles [as by the bait of an angle], partly by violence, [the net or drag] sweeps away<sup>15</sup> and gathers as his own the whole kind. Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans are herein a faint image of Satan, who casts out his baits and his nets in the stormy sea of this life, taking some by individual craft, sweeping others in whole masses, to do evil; and whoso hath no ruler, and will not have Christ to reign over him<sup>16</sup>, he allures, hurries, drags away as his prey. <sup>17</sup> Adam clave to his hook, and he drew him forth out of Paradise with his net; and covered him with his drags, his varied and manifold deceits and guiles. And by one many became sinners, and in Adam we all died, and all saints afterwards were with him alike cast out of Paradise. And because he deceived the first man, he ceaseth not daily to slay the whole human race."

<sup>16</sup>. Therefore they sacrifice unto their net, and burn incense unto their drag. [lit he sacrifices unto his &c.] Whatever a man trusts in, is his god. If a man relies to compass his end by his strength, or his wisdom, or his forethought, or his wealth, his armies or navies, these his forces are his god. So the Assyrian said, <sup>18</sup> By the strength of my hand I did it; and by my wisdom, for I am prudent; and God answered, Shall the axe boast itself against him that heweth therewith? The coarse forms of idolatry only embody outwardly the deep inward idolatry of the corrupt human mind. The idol is <sup>19</sup> set up in the heart first. There have not indeed been wanting savage nations, who in very deed worshipped their arms<sup>20</sup>; those of old worshipped spears as immortal gods<sup>21</sup>; Even now we are told of some North American Indians <sup>22</sup> who designate their bow and arrow as the only beneficient deities whom they know." Among the civilised Romans, the worship of the eagles, their standards<sup>1</sup>, to whom they did sacrifice<sup>2</sup>, was no other nor better. The inward idolatry is only a more subtle form of the same sin, the evil spirit which shapes itself in the outward shew. Here the idolatry of self is meant, which did not join creatures with God as objects of worship; but, denying Him in practice or misbelief, became a god to itself<sup>3</sup>. So Habakkuk had said, this his strength is his god. His idol was himself.

Because by them their portion is fat, and their meat plenteous (lit. as in E. M., well-fed). All the choicest things of the world stood at his command, as Nebuchadnezzar boasted<sup>4</sup>, and all the kingdoms of the world and their glory, all the knowledge and wisdom and learning of the world, and the whole world itself, were Satan's lawful prey<sup>5</sup>. "Nebuchadnezzar, as by a hook and meshes and line, swept into his own land both Israel himself and other nations, encompassing them. Satan, as it were, by one line and net, that of sin, enclosed all, and Israel especially, on account of his impiety to Christ. His food was choice. For Israel was chosen above the rest, as from a holy root, that of the fathers, and having the law as a schoolmaster, and being called to the knowledge of the one true God. Yet he, having this glory and grace, was taken with the rest. They became his prey by error; but Israel, knowing Him Who is by nature God, slaying ungodlily Him Who was by nature His Begotten Son and Who came as Man, were taken in his nets."

17. Shall they therefore empty their net, and not spare continually to slay the nations? The prophet, like Isaiah<sup>7</sup>, stands at the very last point, before the fury and desire of the enemy was fulfilled. Men, like fish, were gathered together for a prey; he who had taken them was rejoicing and exulting beforehand in his booty; his portion and meat were the choice of the earth; the prophet looks on, as it were, and beholds the net full; there is but one step more; "Shall he empty it? Shall he then devour those whom he has caught? and so cast his emptied net again unceasingly, pitilessly, to slay the nations?" This question he answers in the next chapter; A Deliverer will come.

But he had so pleaded with God, repeatedly, Why is this? He has given no hint, that any complained of or reproved him.

"<sup>13</sup> By an image from those who, in war and siege, have the ward of the wall distributed to them, he says, I will stand upon my watch." "<sup>14</sup> It was the wont of the Saints, when they wished to learn the things of God, and to receive the knowledge of things to come through His voice in their mind and heart, to raise it on high above distractions and anxieties and all worldly care, holding and keeping it unoccupied and peaceful, rising as to an eminence to look around and contemplate what the God of all knowledge should make clear to them. For He hateth the earth-bound and abject mind, and seeks hearts which can soar aloft, raised above earthly things and temporal desires." The prophet takes his stand, apart from men and the thoughts and cares of this world, on his lonely watch, as Moses on the rock, keeping himself and kept by God, and planted firm, so that nothing should move him, fenced around though straitened in<sup>15</sup>, as in a besieged camp committed to his ward, looking out from his lofty place what answer God would give as to times long distant, and what answer he should give first to himself, and to those to whom his office lay, God's people.

2. The answer is, that it is indeed for a long time yet. Write the vision, that it may remain for those who come after and not be forgotten, and make it plain<sup>16</sup> upon the tables, whereon he was wont to write<sup>16</sup>; and that, in large lasting characters, that he may run that readeth it, that it may be plain to any, however occupied or in haste. So Isaiah too was bidden to write the four words, haste-prey-speed-spoil.

for the present, but to develop itself in the course of time, down to a season which God only knows; as it is subsequently repeated, <sup>1</sup>for the end is yet for the appointed time; <sup>2</sup>for it is for the appointed time of the end; and is explained, <sup>3</sup>for the vision is yet for the days; <sup>4</sup>for it is for many days; <sup>5</sup>the house of Israel say, The vision that he seeth, is for many days and he prophesieth of the times far off; yet it should haste towards the end, towards its fulfilment, so that, if it is not at once fulfilled, it should be surely waited for. <sup>6</sup>It shall certainly be; not in vain hath it been shewn, but as certainly to be. For whatever hath been shewn to come and to be, will come and be."

But at the end it shall speak<sup>7</sup> [or it breatheth, hasteth to the end], not simply "to its own fulfilment," but to that time of the end which should close the period assigned to it, during which it should continually be putting itself forth, it should come true in part or in shadow, gleams of it should here and there part the clouds, which, until the end, should surround and envelope it. Being God's truth, he speaks of it as an animate living thing, not a dead letter, but running, hasting on its course, and accomplishing on its way that for which it was sent. The will and purpose of God hasteth on, though to man it seemeth to tarry; it can neither be hurried on, nor doth it linger; before the appointed time it cometh not; yet it hasteth towards it, and will not be behindhand when the time comes. It does not lie, either by failing to come, or failing, when come, of any jot or tittle. Though it tarry or linger<sup>8</sup>, continually appearing, giving signs of itself, yet continually delaying its coming, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not be behindhand<sup>9</sup>, when the time comes. <sup>10</sup>He cometh quickly also, as He saith; because <sup>11</sup>though the delay of His Coming and of the fulfilment of the vision seem long, yet, in comparison with eternity, it is very short. In His First Coming, He taught why God permitteth these things; in the Second, He shall teach by experience, how good it is for the good to bear the persecution of the evil; whence S. Peter also has to say, <sup>12</sup>The Lord is not slack concerning His promise, as some men count slackness." The words seem to belong, in the first instance, to the vision itself; but the vision had no other existence or fulfilment than in Him Who was the Object of it, and Who, in it, was foreshadowed to the mind. The coming of the vision was no other than His Coming. The waiting, to which he exhorts, expresses the religious act, so often spoken of, <sup>13</sup>of waiting for God, or His counsel, or His promised time. The sense then is wholly the same, when S. Paul uses the words of the Coming of our Lord Himself, <sup>14</sup>Yet a little while, and He that shall come, will come and will not tarry. S. Paul, as well as Habakkuk, is speaking of our Lord's Second Coming; S. Paul, of His Coming in Person, Habakkuk, of the effects of that Coming <sup>15</sup>; but both alike of the redressing of all the evil and wrong in the world's history, and the reward of the faithful oppressed. At His First Coming He said, <sup>16</sup>Now is the judgement of this world; now shall the prince of this world be cast out. He came to <sup>17</sup>put down the mighty from their seat, and to exalt the humble and meek; but much more in the Second, when <sup>18</sup>He shall come to judge the world with righteousness and the people with His truth, and to <sup>19</sup>reward every man according to his works. At all times He seemeth continually to linger, to give signs of His Coming, yet He cometh not; when the appointed season shall come, He shall be found not to be "later" than His word. Yea, all time shall shrink up into a little moment in the presence of a never-ending ever-present eternity.

<sup>20</sup>Having named no one expressly, he says, wait for him, wait for him although delaying, and halt not in thy hope, but let it be rooted and firm, even if the interval be extended. For the God of all seemeth to suggest to the mind of the Prophet, that He who was foretold would surely come, yet to enjoin on him to wait for Him on account of the interval. He who believeth My word shall possess life, for this is the reward of those who honour God, and a good reward of His benevolence. He who admitteth faith and love to dwell in his heart hath as a requital, un-aging life and forgiveness of sins and sanctification by the Spirit. <sup>21</sup>He shall live; for <sup>22</sup>God is not the God of the dead but of the living, <sup>23</sup>Whoso liveth and believeth in Me, shall never die."

It will not lie. God vouchsafes to speak of Himself, as we should be ashamed to speak of one whom we love, teaching us that all doubts question His truth. <sup>24</sup>God is not a man, that He should lie: hath He said and shall He not do it? <sup>25</sup>The strength of Israel shall neither lie nor repent. <sup>26</sup>God that cannot lie, promised before the world began. Therefore it follows, wait for Him, as Jacob says, <sup>27</sup>I have waited for Thy salvation, O Lord.

4. Behold, his soul which is lifted up [lit. swollen<sup>28</sup>] is not upright in him. The construction is probably that of a condition expressed absolutely. Lo, swollen is it, not upright is his soul in him. We should say, 'His soul, if it be swollen<sup>29</sup>, puffed up, is not upright in him.' The source of all sin was and is pride. It is especially the sin of all oppressors, of the Chaldee, of Anti-Christ, and shall be of the Anti-Christ. It is the parent of all heresy, and of all corruption and rejection of the Gospel. It stands therefore as the type of all opposed follows the Rabbins [Kim. Comm., A. E., Tanch., Rashi, Abarb.] so far in rendering נִשְׁמָע, "speak." Yet in all the cases of both roots נִשְׁמָע, נִשְׁמָע, except Prov. xii. 17, נִשְׁמָע, the root is used not of mere "speaking" but of "breathing out" like ἐκπνεῖν ἀπειλῆς (Acts xi. 1.) "breathing out threatening." In five cases it occurs in the one idiom, "breatheth out lies," נִשְׁמָע כֹּזֵבִים, Pr. vi. 19, xiv. 5, 25, xix. 5, 9. In other idioms נִשְׁמָע בָּרִים, נִשְׁמָע Ps. x. 5, xii. 6, it is still used of puffing at "contemptuously." Else the Kal is used of the cool air of the evening Cant. ii. 17. iv. 6, and Hifil of "causing to blow," Ib. iv. 16. Else it is only used (metaph.) of blowing up, kindling, (as we say) stirring up a city to strife Pr. xxix. 8, and blowing up the fire of the wrath of God, Ez. xxi. 36. נִשְׁמָע is used of the deep sigh of agony Jer. iv. 31. and נִשְׁמָע Ps. xxviii. 12. "breathing forth violence" stands united with "false witness" as in the Prov. If understood then of speaking, it would be "breathing of the end" (ל relating to the subject of the speech, as so often) which would be much the same as, breatheth panting towards the end, (like ל נִשְׁמָע, Eccl. i. 5.)

to it. Of it he says, it is in its very inmost core [in him] lacking in uprightness. It can have no good in it, because it denies God, and God denies it His grace. And having nothing upright in it, being corrupt in its very inmost being, it cannot stand or abide. God gives it no power to stand. The words stand in contrast with the following, the one speaking of the cause of death, the other of life. The soul, being swollen with pride, shuts out faith, and with it the Presence of God. It is all crooked in its very inner self or being. S. Paul gives the result, <sup>1</sup> if any man draw back, my soul hath no pleasure in him. The prophet's words describe the proud man who stands aloof from God, in himself; S. Paul, as he is in the Eyes of God. As that which is swollen in nature cannot be straight, it is clean contrary that the soul should be swollen with pride and yet upright. Its moral life being destroyed in its very inmost heart, it must perish.

<sup>2</sup> Plato saith, that properly is straight, which being applied to what is straight, touches and is touched every where. But God is upright, Whom the upright soul touches and is touched every where; but what is not upright is bent away from God. <sup>3</sup> God is good unto Israel, the upright in heart. <sup>4</sup> The upright love thee. <sup>5</sup> The way of the just is uprightness, Thou, most Upright, dost weigh the path of the just.<sup>6</sup>

But the just shall live by his faith. The accents emphasise the words <sup>6</sup>, The just, by his faith he shall live. They do not point to an union of the words, the just by his faith. Isaiah says that Christ should justify many by the knowledge of Himself<sup>7</sup>, but the expression, just by his faith, does not occur either in the O. or N. T. In fact, to speak of one really righteous<sup>8</sup> as being "righteous by his faith" would imply that men could be righteous in some other way. Without faith, S. Paul says at the commencement of his Old Testament pictures of giant faith, <sup>9</sup> it is impossible to please God. Faith, in the creature which does not yet see God, has one and the same principle, a trustful relying belief in its Creator. This was the characteristic of Abraham their father, unshaken, unswerving, belief in God Who called him, whether in leaving his own land and going whither he knew not, for an end which he was never to see; or in believing the promise of the son through whom that Seed was to be, in Whom all the nations of the world should be blessed; or in the crowning act of offering that son to God, knowing that he should receive him back, even from the dead. In all, it was one and the same principle. <sup>10</sup> His belief was counted to him for righteousness, though the immediate instance of that faith was not directly spiritual. In this was the good and bad of Israel. <sup>11</sup> The people believed. <sup>12</sup> They believed the Lord and His servant Moses. <sup>13</sup> Then believed they His word, they sang His praise. This contrariwise was their blame. <sup>14</sup> In this ye did not believe the Lord. <sup>15</sup> Ye rebelled against the commandment of the Lord your God, and believed Him not, nor hearkened to His voice. <sup>16</sup> They forgot God their Saviour; they despised the pleasant land, they believed not His word. And God asks, <sup>17</sup> How long will it be, ere this people believe Me, for all the signs which I have shown among them? <sup>18</sup> Anger came upon Israel, because they believed not in God, and in His salvation trusted not. <sup>19</sup> For all this they sinned still, and believed not His wondrous works. Even of Moses and Aaron God assigns this as the ground, why they should not bring His people into the land which He gave them, <sup>20</sup> Because ye believed Me not, to sanctify Me in the eyes of the children of Israel (at Meribah). This was the watchword of Jehoshaphat's victory, <sup>21</sup> Believe in the Lord your God and ye shall be established; believe His prophets, so shall ye prosper. This continued to be one central saying of Isaiah. It was his own commission to his people; <sup>22</sup> Go and say to this people; hear ye on, and understand not; see ye on and perceive not. In sight of the rejection of faith, he spake prominently of the loss upon unbelief; <sup>23</sup> If ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established; and, <sup>24</sup> Who hath believed our report? he premises as the attitude of his people towards Him, the Centre of all faith, Jesus. Yet still, as to the blessings of faith, having spoken of Him, <sup>25</sup> Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, he subjoins, he that believeth in Him shall not make haste.

So it had been the key-note of Habakkuk to his people, Ye will not believe when it is declared unto you. Here he is bid to declare contrariwise the blessing on belief. The just shall live by his faith. The faith, then, of which Habakkuk speaks, is faith, in itself, but a real, true confiding faith. It is the one relation of the creature to the Creator, unshaken trust. The faith may vary in character, according as God reveals more or less of Himself, but itself is one, a loving trust in Him, just as He reveals Himself. <sup>26</sup> By this faith in God, each righteous person begins to live piously, righteously, holily, peacefully and divinely, and advanceth therein, since in every tribulation and misery, by this faith and hope in God he sustains, strengthens, and increases this life of the soul. He says then, the just lives by faith, i. e., the unbelieving and unrighteous displeases God, and consequently will not live by the true, right, peaceful and happy life of grace, present righteousness, and future glory, because God is displeased with him, and he places his hopes and fears, not in God, but in men and man's help and in created things. But the righteous who believeth in God shall live a right, sweet, quiet, happy, holy, untroubled life, because, fixed by faith and hope in God Who is the true Life, and in God's promises, he is dear to God, and the object of His care.

"This sentence, the just shall live by faith, is universal, belonging at once to Jews and Christians, to sinners who are first being justified, as also to those who are already justified. For the spiritual life of each of these begins, is maintained and grows through faith. When then it is said, the just shall live by his faith, this word, his, marks the cause, which both begins and preserves life. The just, believing and hoping in God, begins to live spiritually, to have a soul right within him, whereby he pleases God; and again, advancing and making progress in this his faith and hope in God, therewith advances and makes progress in the spiritual life, in rightness and righteousness of soul, in the grace and friendship of God, so as more and more to please God."

Most even of the Jewish interpreters have seen this to be the literal meaning of the words. It stands in contrast with, illustrates and is illustrated by the first words, his soul is swollen, is not upright in him. Pride and independence of God are the centre of the want of rightness; a steadfast cleaving to God, whereby the heart, as Abraham's, was stayed on God, is the centre and cause of the life of the righteous.

But since this stayedness of faith is in everything the source of the life of the righteous, then the pride, which issues in want of rightness of the inmost soul, must be a state of death. Pride estranges the soul from God, makes it self-sufficing, that it should not need God, so that he who is proud cannot come to God, to be by Him made righteous. So contrariwise, since by his faith doth the righteous live, this must be equally true whether he be just made righteous from unrighteous, or whether that righteousness is growing, maturing, being perfected in him.

This life begins in grace, lives on in glory. It is begun, in that God freely justifies the ungodly, accounting and making him righteous for and through the Blood of Christ; it is continued in faith which worketh by love; it is perfected, when faith and hope are swallowed up in love, beholding God. In the Epistles to the Romans<sup>1</sup> and the Galatians<sup>2</sup> St. Paul applies these words to the first beginning of life, when they who had before been dead in sin, began to live by faith in Christ Jesus Who gave them life and made them righteous. And in this sense he is called "just," although before he comes to the Faith he is unjust and unrighteous, being unjustified. For St. Paul uses the word not of what he was before the faith, but what he is, when he lives by faith. Before, not having faith, he had neither righteousness nor life; having faith, he at once has both; he is at once just and lives by his faith. These are inseparable. The faith by which he lives, is a living faith,<sup>3</sup> faith which worketh by love. In the Epistle to the Hebrews<sup>4</sup>, St. Paul is speaking of their endurance in the faith, once received, whose faith is not shaken by the trial of their patience. They who look on beyond things present, and fix their minds steadfastly on the Coming of Christ, will not suffer shipwreck of their faith, through any troubles of this time. Faith is the foundation of all good, the beginning of the spiritual building, whereby it rests on The Foundation, Christ. Without faith it is impossible to please God, and so the proud cannot please Him. Through it, is union with Christ and thereby a divine life in the soul, even a life<sup>5</sup> through faith in the Son of God, holy, peaceful, self-possessed<sup>6</sup>, enduring to the end, being 'kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time.

5. This general rule the Prophet goes on to apply in words which belong in part to all oppressors and in the first instance to the Chaldean, in part yet more fully to the end and to Anti-Christ. Yea also, because he transgresseth by wine [or better, Yea, how much more, since wine is a deceiver], as Solomon says,<sup>7</sup> Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging, and whosoever erreth thereby shall not be wise, and,<sup>8</sup> In the end it biteth like a serpent and pierceth like an adder; and Hosea, by wine, he is a proud man, neither keepeth

Before
cir. 626.

<sup>11</sup> Whoredom and wine and new wine take away the heart. As wine at first gladdens, then deprives of all reason, and lays a man open to any deceit, so also pride. And whereas all pride deceives, how much more<sup>12</sup>, when men are either heated and excited by the abuse of God's natural gifts, or drunken with prosperity and hurried away, as conquerors are, to all excess of cruelty or lust to fulfil their own will, and neglect the laws of God and man. Literal drunkenness was a sin of the Babylonians under the Persian rule, so that even a heathen says of Babylon, "<sup>13</sup> Nothing can be more corrupt than the manners of that city, and more provided with all to rouse and entice immoderate pleasures;" and "the Babylonians give themselves wholly to wine, and the things which follow upon drunkenness." It was when flushed<sup>14</sup> with wine, that Belshazzar, with his princes his wives and his concubines, desecrated the sacred vessels, insulted God in honour of his idols, and in the night of his excess "was slain." Pride blinded, deceived, destroyed him. It was the general drunkenness of the inhabitants, at that same feast, which enabled Cyrus, with a handful of men, to penetrate, by means of its river, the city which, with its provisions for many years<sup>15</sup> and its impregnable walls, mocked at his siege. He calculated beforehand on its feast<sup>16</sup> and the consequent dissolution of its inhabitants; but for this, in the language of the heathen historian, he would have been caught "<sup>17</sup> as in a trap," his soldiery drowned.

He is a proud man<sup>18</sup>, neither keepeth at home. It is difficult to limit the force of the rare Hebrew word rendered, <sup>19</sup> keep at home; for one may cease to dwell or abide at home either with his will or without it; and, as in the case of invaders, the one may be the result of the other. He who would take away the home of others becomes, by God's Providence, himself homeless. The context implies that the primary meaning is the restlessness of ambition; which abides not at home, for his whole pleasure is to go forth to destroy. Yet there sounds, as it were, an undertone, "he would not abide in his home, and he shall not." We could scarcely avoid the further thought, could we translate by a word which does not determine the sense, "he will not home," "he will not continue at home." The words have seemed to different minds to mean either; as they may<sup>20</sup>. Such fulness of meaning is the contrary of the ambiguity of Heathen oracles: they are not alternative meanings, which might be justified in either case, but cumulative, the one on the other. The ambitious part with present rest for future loss. Nebuchadnezzar lost his kingdom and his reason through pride, received them back when he humbled himself; Belshazzar, being proud and impenitent, lost both his kingdom and life.

Arab. only supplies <sup>21</sup> "perseverance in litigation:" the meaning "prominence, swelling" is assumed only. The Arab. <sup>22</sup> (in Ges. Hitz.) is from <sup>23</sup> (med. 1) and signifies "a sand-heap," not as heaped up, but as sinking asunder, "corruens," (the central meaning of <sup>24</sup>).

at home, who enlargeth his desire <sup>a</sup> as hell, and ~~is~~ as death, and cannot be satisfied, but gathereth unto him all nations, and heapeth unto him all people:

6 Shall not all these <sup>b</sup> take up a para-

Before
cir. 626.
Or, Ho, he.

Who enlargeth his desire, lit. his soul. The soul becomes like what it loves. The ambitious man is, as we say, "all ambition;" the greedy man, "all appetite;" the cruel man, "all savagery;" the vain-glorious, "all vain-glory." The ruling passion absorbs the whole being. It is his end, the one object of his thoughts, hopes, fears. So, as we speak of "largeness of heart," which can embrace in its affections all varieties of human interests, whatever affects man, and "largeness of mind" uncramped by narrowing prejudices, the Prophet speaks of this "ambitious man widening his soul," or, as we should speak, "appetite," so that the whole world is not too large for him to long to grasp or to devour. So the Psalmist prays not to be delivered into the murderous desire of his enemies<sup>1</sup>, (lit. their soul), and Isaiah, with a metaphor almost too bold for our language, <sup>2</sup> Hell hath enlarged her soul, and opened her mouth beyond measure. It devours, as it were, first in its cravings, then in act.

As hell, which is insatiable<sup>3</sup>. He saith, enlargeth; for as hell and the grave are year by year fuller, yet there is no end, the desire enlargeth and becometh wider, the more is given to it to satisfy it. And [he<sup>4</sup>] is [himself] as death, sparing none. Our poetry would speak of a destroyer as being "like the angel of death;" his presence, as the presence of death itself. Where he is, there is death. He is as terrible and as destroying as the death which follows him. And cannot be satisfied. Even human proverbs say, "The love of money groweth as much as the money itself groweth." "The avaricious is ever needy." <sup>5</sup> He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver. For these fleeting things cannot satisfy the undying soul. It must hunger still; for it has not found what will allay its cravings<sup>7</sup>.

But gathereth lit. And hath gathered—He describes it, for the rapidity with which he completes what he longs for, as though it were already done,—unto him all nations, and heapeth unto him all people. One is still the subject of the prophecy, rising up at successive times, fulfilling it and passing away, Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander, Attila, Timur, Genghizchan, Hunneric, scourges of God, all deceived by pride, all sweeping the earth, all in their ambition and wickedness the unknowing agents and images of the evil One, who seeks to bring the whole world under his rule. But shall it prosper?

6. Shall not all these<sup>8</sup> take up a parable against him, and a taunting proverb against him? Nebuchadnezzar gathered <sup>9</sup> all people, nations, and languages, to worship the golden image which he had set up. The second Babylon, heathen Rome, sought to blot out the very Christian Name; but mightier were the three children than the King of Babylon; mightier, virgins, martyrs, and children than Nero or Decius. These shall rejoice over Babylon, that <sup>10</sup> God hath avenged them on her.

Woe to him that increaseth that which is not his! Truly wealth ill-gotten by fraud or oppression, is not his, who winneth it, before he had it, nor when he hath it, but a woe. It is not his; the woe is his. Woe unto him. He shall have no joy in what he gaineth, and what he hath he shall lose. How long? What is the measure of thine impiety and greediness and cruelty? Yet if these are like hell, without measure, there remains another How long? How long will the forbearance of God endure thee, which thou art daily exhausting?

This is then the end of all. The conqueror sweeps to him all nations and gathereth to him all peoples. To what end? As one vast choir in one terrible varied chant of all those thousand thousand voices, to sing a dirge over him of the judgements of God which his ill-doings to them should bring upon him, a fivefold Woe, woe, woe, woe, woe! Woe for its rapacity! Woe for its covetousness! Woe for its oppression! Woe for its insolence to the conquered! Woe to it in its rebellion against God! It is a more measured rhythm than any besides in Holy Scripture; each of the fivefold woes comprised in three verses, four of them closing with the ground, because, for. The opening words carry the mind back to the fuller picture of Isaiah. But Isaiah sees Babylon as already overthrown; Nabakkuk pronounces the words upon it, not by name, but as certainly to come, upon it and every like enemy of God's kingdom. With each such fall, unto the end of all things, the glory of God is increased and made known. Having, for their own ends, been unconscious and even unwilling promoters of God's end, they, when they had accomplished it, are themselves flung away. The pride of human ambition, when successful, boasts "woe to the conquered." Since whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, the ungodly saying of the heathen is reversed, and it stands, "Man sympathises with the conquering side, God with the conquered." It is a terrible thought that men should have been the instruments of God, that they should, through ambition or other ends short of God, have promoted His ends which they thought not of, and then should be weighed in the balance and found wanting, and themselves be flung away.

<sup>11</sup> Gentiles also departed from their worship under Satan, and having deserted him who aforetime called them, ran unto Christ. For Satan gathered what was not his; but Christ received what was His. For, as God, He is Lord of all."

And to him that ladeth himself with thick clay<sup>12</sup>. It is the

by A. E.) Sal. B. Mel., explaining it "abundance of clay." Kimchi (Shorashim) admits the possibility of its being derived from עָבָה sub v., but himself says it is a compound word. Saadiah Ben Denan Lex. Heb.-Arab. [Bodl. Or. 612] alone positively derives it from עָבָה. The objection that there are no compound appellatives in Hebrew is contrary to the evidence of such words as בָּלִיל, בָּלִיל, בָּלִיל, and amid the predominance of compound words, as Proper Names, it would be monstrous to assume that a Prophet could not have compounded a word. On the other hand, the forms נִשְׁכָּח, נִשְׁכָּח, נִשְׁכָּח, נִשְׁכָּח, are remarkable analogies in favour of its being a single word. It was probably formed to suggest both thoughts, as it has.

7 Shall they not rise up suddenly that shall bite thee, and awake that shall vex thee, and thou shalt be for booties unto them?

character of these proverbs to say much in few words, sometimes in one, and more than appears. So the word translated thick-clay, as if it were two words, in another way means in an intensive sense, "a strong deep pledge." At best gold and silver are, as they have been called, red and white earth. "<sup>1</sup> What are gold and silver but red and white earth, which the error of man alone maketh, or accounteth precious? What are gems, but stones of the earth? What silk, but webs of worms?" These he "maketh heavy upon" or "against himself" [so the words strictly mean]. "For he weigheth himself down with thick clay, who, by avarice multiplying earthly things, hems himself in by the oppressiveness of his own sin, imprisons and, as it were, buries the soul, and heaps up sin as he heaps up wealth." With toil they gather what is not worthless only, but is a burden upon the soul, weighing it down that it should not rise Heavenwards, but should be bowed down to Hell. And so in that other sense while, as a hard usurer, he heaps up the pledges of those whom he oppresses and impoverishes, and seems to increase his wealth, he does in truth increase against himself a strong pledge, whereby not others are debtors to him, but he is a debtor to Almighty God Who careth for the oppressed. <sup>2</sup> He that gathereth riches and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days and at his end shall be a fool.

7. Shall not they rise up suddenly that shall bite thee, and awake that shall vex thee? The destruction of the wicked is ever sudden at last. Such was the flood<sup>3</sup>, the destruction of Sodom, of Pharaoh, of the enemies of God's people through the Judges, of Sennacherib, Nineveh, Babylon by the Medes and Persians. Such shall the end be<sup>4</sup>. As he by his oppressions had pierced others (it is the word used of the oppression of usury<sup>5</sup>), so should it be done to him. "<sup>6</sup> The Medes and Persians who were before subject to the Babylonian empire, and whose kings were subject to Nebuchadnezzar and his successors, rose up and awaked, i. e., stirred themselves up in the days of Belshazzar to rebel against the successors of Nebuchadnezzar which sat on his throne, like a man who awaketh from sleep." The words awake, arise, are used also of the resurrection, when the worm of the wicked gnaweth and dieth not<sup>7</sup>.

And thou shalt be for booties unto them? The common phrase is modified to explain the manifoldness of the plunder<sup>8</sup> which he should yield. So Jeremiah, <sup>9</sup> Chaldaea shall be a spoil; all that spoil her shall be satisfied, saith the Lord. "<sup>10</sup> We may hear Him Who saith, <sup>11</sup> How can one enter into a strong man's house, and spoil his goods, except he first bind the strong man? and then he will spoil his house. For, as soon as He was born of the holy Virgin, He began to spoil his goods. For the Magi came from the East—and worshipped Him and honoured Him with gifts and became a first-fruits of the Church of the Gentiles. And being vessels of Satan, and the most honoured of all his members, they hastened to Christ."

8. Because, [or For]. The Prophet assigns the reason of the woes he had just pronounced. Thou<sup>12</sup> [emph.], thou hast spoiled many nations, all the remnant of the people shall spoil thee. So Isaiah, <sup>13</sup> When thou shalt cease to spoil, thou shalt be spoiled; when thou shalt make an end to deal treacherously, they shall deal treacherously with thee. Boundless as his conquests were, each remaining people, tribe, or family shall be his foe. "<sup>14</sup> Having subdued very many, thou shalt be destroyed by few, and they who long endured thy tyranny, arising as from sleep, shall compass thy destruction; and thou shalt pay the penalty of thy countless slaughters and thy great ungodliness and thy lawless violence to cities which thou madest desolate of inhabitants." Nothing was too great or too little to escape this violence.

All the remnant. "<sup>15</sup> As thou, invading, didst take away the things of others, in like way shall what appertaineth to thee be taken away by those who are left for vengeance." Jeremiah foretold of Elam in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah<sup>16</sup>, (in expansion of the prophecy in the reign of Jehoia-kim<sup>17</sup>): Thus saith the Lord of hosts, Behold, I will break the bow of Elam, the chief of their might. And upon Elam I will bring the four winds from the four quarters of the heavens, and will scatter them towards all these winds, and there shall be no nation whither the outcasts of Elam shall not come. For I will cause Elam to be dismayed before her enemies; but it shall come to pass in the latter days, that I will bring again the captivity of Elam, saith the Lord. Elam is also counted by Ezekiel<sup>18</sup> among those who, together with Pharaoh, should be brought down to the grave, with Asshur, Meshech, Tubal, Edom and all the Zidonians, by the king of Babylon. They were then all which remained<sup>19</sup> of the nations which he had conquered, who should be gathered against his house. Because of men's blood and of the violence of i. e. to the land, as the violence of, i. e. to<sup>20</sup>, Lebanon, and men's blood is their blood which was shed. To land, city, and all dwellers therein. Land or earth, city, are left purposely undefined, so that while that in which the offence culminated should be, by the singular, specially suggested, the violence to Judah and Jerusalem, the cruelty condemned should not be limited to these. The violence was dealt out to the whole land or earth, and in it, to cities, and in each, one by one, to all its inhabitants. Babylon is called,<sup>21</sup> the hammer of the whole earth; <sup>22</sup> a golden cup in the Lord's hand, that made all the earth drunken; <sup>23</sup> a destroying mountain, which destroyeth the whole earth; the whole

"every thing which shall bite," De. xxiii. 20. חֶסֶד (De. xxiii. 20. 21 bis) is properly a denom. from חָסַד, explained to be "what bites the giver and takes something of his from him." Mezia (60. b. in Del. The חֶסֶד, v. 6. suggested חֶסֶד, and this, favoured by the conception of the Chaldeans as a pitiless creditor, concentrated in עֶבֶד, suggested חֶסֶד, (which is often united with חֶסֶד), and this suggested the remarkable designation of those who were to execute the Divine retribution on the Chaldeans by the word, עֶבֶד.

to tremble<sup>2</sup>, is overthrown.

So Satan had by violence and deceit subdued the whole earth, yet Christ made him a spoil to those whom he had spoiled, and the strong man was bound and his goods spoiled and himself trampled underfoot. Yet here as throughout the prophets, it is a "remnant" only which is saved. "3 Satan too was spoiled by the remnant of the people, i. e. by those justified by Christ and sanctified in the Spirit. For the remnant of Israel was saved."

9. Woe to him that coveteth an evil covetousness to his house [or, with accents, that coveteth covetousness or unjust gain, an evil to his house.] What man coveteth seems gain, but is evil to his house after him, destroying both himself and his whole family or race with him<sup>4</sup>. That he may set his nest on high, as an eagle, to which he had likened the Chaldee<sup>5</sup>.
A heathen called "strongholds, the nests of tyrants." The nest was placed "on high" which means also "heaven," as it is said, <sup>6</sup> though thou set thy nest among the stars; and the tower of Babel was to <sup>7</sup> reach unto heaven; and the Anti-Christ, whose symbol the King of Babylon is, says, <sup>8</sup> I will exalt my throne above the stars of God. Babylon lying in a large plain, on the sides of the Euphrates, the image of its eagle's-nest on high must be taken, not from any natural eminence, but wholly from the works of man. Its walls, and its hanging gardens were among "the seven wonders of the world." Eye witnesses speak of its walls, encompassing at the least 100 square miles<sup>9</sup>, "10 and as large as the landgraviat of HesseHomburg;" those walls, 335, or 330 feet high, and 85 feet broad<sup>11</sup>; a fortified palace, near 7 miles in circumference; gardens, 400 Greek feet square, supporting at an artificial height arch upon arch, of "at least 75 feet," forest trees; a temple to its god, said to have been at least 600 feet high. Had we, creatures of a day, no one above us, Nebuchadnezzar's boast had been true<sup>12</sup>, Is not this great Ba- bylon that I have builded for the house of the Kingdom by the might of my power and for the honour of my majesty? He had built an eagle's nest, which no human arm could reach, encircled by walls which laughed its invaders to scorn, which no then skill could scale or shatter or mine. Even as one sees in a picture the vast mounds which yet remain<sup>13</sup>, one can hardly imagine that they were, brick upon brick, wholly the work of man.

defy. It was indeed a living power, since it was the Will of Almighty God, Whose servant and instrument Cyrus was, to chasten Babylon, when its sins were full. Such was the counsel, what the result? The evil covetousness which he wrought, brought on him the evil, from which, in that nest built by the hard toil of his captives, he thought to deliver himself.

10. Thou hast consulted shame to thy house, the cutting off many people, and sinning against thy soul. The wicked, whether out of passion or with his whole mind and deliberate choice and will, takes that counsel, which certainly brings shame to himself and his house, according to the law of God, whereby He <sup>15</sup> visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate Him, i. e. until by righteousness and restitution the curse is cut off. <sup>16</sup> He that is greedy of gain troubleth his own house.
So Jeremiah says, <sup>17</sup> Thus saith the Lord, Is it Me they are reaving? is it not themselves, for <sup>18</sup> the confusion of their faces?
i. e. with that end and object. Holy Scripture overlooks the means, and places us at the end of all. Whatever the wicked had in view, to satisfy ambition, avarice, passion, love of pleasure, or the rest of man's immediate ends, all he was doing was leading on to a further end, shame and death. He was bringing about, not only these short-lived, but the lasting ends beyond, and these far more than the others, since that is the real end of a thing which abides, in which it at last ends. He consulted to cut off many people and was thereby (though he knew it not) by one and the same act, guilty of and forfeiting his own soul<sup>19</sup>.

11. For the stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber shall answer it. All things have a voice, in that they are<sup>20</sup>. God's works speak that, for which He made them. <sup>21</sup> The heavens declare the glory of God. <sup>22</sup> The valleys are clad with corn, they laugh, yea, they sing; their very look speaks gladness. "3 For the creation itself proclaims the glory of the Maker, in that it is admired as well made.
Wherefore there are voices in things, although there are not words." Man's works speak of that in him, out of which and for which he made them. Works of mercy go up for a memorial before God, and plead there; great works, wrought amid wrong and cruelty and for man's ambition and pride, have a voice too, and cry out to God, calling down His vengeance on the oppressor. Here the stones of the wall, whereby the building is raised, and the beam, the tie-beam, out of the timber-work<sup>23</sup> wherewith it is finished, and which,
as it were, crowns the work, join, as in a chorus, answer-

<sup>23</sup> So the word is best understood, since the "beam" bears the same relation to the "wood-work" as the "stone" to the "wall," i. e. is a part of it, כֶּסֶם in Ch. signifying "to bind," like כָּסַם Dan. iii. 20, 21, 23, 24. So Kim. The other sense given, that it is a half-brick, such as is worked into the mode of building, called by us "bricknogging," which R. Tanchum of Jerusalem also knew in the East, seems unsuited here; 1) because it is speaking of magnificent building; the interlacing of brick with wood is for economy, since the wood, interlacing the bricks, holds them together, though the wall be thin; 2) the half-bricks naturally enter into this mode of building, but are neither the chief nor a prominent part of it. 3) Neither is the woodwork apparently in such way one, that it

ing one another, and in a deep solemn wailing, before God and the whole world, together chant "Woe, Woe." Did not the blood and groans of men cry out to God, speechless things have a voice to appeal to Him<sup>1</sup>. Against Belshazzar the wall had, to the letter, words to speak.

Each three verses forming one stanza, as it were, of the dirge, the following words are probably not directly connected with the former, as if the woe, which follows, were, so to speak, the chant of these inanimate witnesses against the Chaldeans; yet they stand connected with it. The dirge began with woe on the wrongful accumulation of wealth from the conquered and oppressed people; it continues with the selfish use of the wealth so won.

12. Woe to him that buildeth a town with blood, and establisheth a city by iniquity! Nebuchadnezzar "<sup>2</sup> encircled the inner city with three walls and the outer city also with three, all of burnt brick. And having fortified the city with wondrous works, and adorned the gates like temples, he built another palace near the palace of his fathers, surpassing it in height and its great magnificence." He seemed to strengthen the city, and to stablish it by outward defences. But it was built through cruelty to conquered nations, and especially God's people, and by oppression, against His holy Will. So there was an inward rottenness and decay in what seemed strong and majestic, and which imposed on the outward eye; it would not stand, but fell. Babylon, which had stood since the flood, being enlarged contrary to the eternal laws of God, fell in the reign of his son. Such is all empire and greatness, raised on the neglect of God's laws, by unlawful conquests, and by the toil and sweat and hard service of the poor. Its aggrandisement and seeming strength is its fall. Daniel's exhortation to Nebuchadnezzar, <sup>3</sup> Redeem thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by shewing mercy on the poor, implies that oppressiveness had been one of his chief sins.

13. Behold, is it not of the Lord of hosts that [the] people [nations] shall labour<sup>1</sup> in [for] the very fire [lit. to suffice the fire]? By God's appointment, the end of all their labour is for the fire, what may suffice it to consume. This is the whole result of their labour; and so it is as if they had toiled for this; they built ceiled palaces and gorgeous buildings, only for the fire to consume them.

And peoples shall weary themselves for very vanity. They wearied themselves, and what was their reward? What had they to suffice and fill them? Emptiness. This is from the Lord of hosts, Whom all the armies of heaven obey and all creatures stand at His command against the ungodly, and in Whose Hand are all the hosts of earth, and so the oppressor's also, to turn as He wills.

Near upon the first stage of the fulfilment, Jeremiah reinforces the words with the name of Babylon; <sup>5</sup> Thus saith

the Lord of hosts! The broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly destroyed, and her high gates shall be burned with fire; and the people shall labour in vain [for vanity], and the folk in [for] the fire, and they shall be weary.

14. For the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord. Habakkuk modifies in a degree the words of Isaiah which he embodies, marking that the destruction of Babylon was a stage only towards the coming of those good things which God taught His people to long for, not their very coming. All the world should be then full of the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, not, as yet, wholly of Himself. "<sup>6</sup> When Babylon shall be overthrown, then shall the power of the might of the Lord be known unto all. So shall the whole earth be filled with the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the bottom of the sea. This as to the letter. But it is plain, that the Devil also and Anti-Christ, and the perverse teaching of heretics, build a city in blood; i. e., their own Church, with the destruction of those whom they deceive. . . . But when they fail in the fire, (either this fire which is felt, or consumed in the fire of the devil their prince, or burned up with the fire whereof the Lord says, I came to send a fire upon the earth, and so brought back from their former course, and doing penitence), the whole earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord, when, at the preaching of the Apostles, their sound shall go out into all the world, as waters covering the sea, i. e., all the saltiness and bitterness of the world which Satan had rained down and the earth had drunk, the waters of the Lord shall cover, and cause the place of their ancient bitterness not to appear." "<sup>7</sup> For the Spirit of the Lord filled the earth, and when He filled it, the earth was filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, so that unlearned and ignorant men became wise and eloquent, and earthly became heavenly, yea, they who were earth became heaven, knowing the Glory of the Lord, declaring the Glory of God, not any how, but as waters cover the sea. Great as must be waters, which would cover the sea, or compared to which the sea were nothing, far greater is the miracle, when the abundance of heavenly wisdom, given to the simple, surpassed the sea, i. e., the wisdom of all mankind." This verse being already a received image of the spread of the Gospel<sup>8</sup>, it would of itself be understood to include this also; but more generally, it declares how upon all the judgements of God, a larger knowledge of Him would follow. "<sup>9</sup> All things are full of Christ, Who is the Glory of the Father; wherefore also He said, <sup>10</sup> I have glorified Thee on earth, I have finished the work which Thou gavest me to do."

15. From cruelty the Prophet goes on to denounce the woe on insolence. Woe unto him that giveth his neighbour (to whom he owes love) drink [lit. that maketh him drink];

This may either be of actual insults (as in the history of Noah), in keeping certainly with the character of the later Babylonians, the last wantonness of unbridled power, making vile sport of those like himself (his neighbour), or it may be drunkenness through misery <sup>4</sup> where-in they are bared of all their glory and brought to the lowest shame. The woe falls too on all, who in any way intoxicate others with flattering words or feigned affection, mixing poison under things pleasant, to bring them to shame.

16. Thou art filled with shame for glory. Oppressors think to make themselves great by bringing others down, to fill themselves with riches, by spoiling others. They loved shame <sup>5</sup>, because they loved that, which brought shame; they were filled with shame, in that they sated themselves with shamefulfulness, which was their shame within, before, in the just judgement of God, shame came on them from without. <sup>6</sup> Their glory was in their shame. They shall be filled, yea, he says, they are already filled <sup>7</sup>; they would satisfy, gorge themselves, with all their hearts' desires; they are filled to the full, but with shame instead of glory which they sought, or which they already had. Ew. Lehrb. p. 408. It was regarded as a compound word by S. Jerome's Hebrew instructor, "vomitus ignominie," the Midrash Ester Rabb. 121. c. (in Del.) Kim. Sal. B. Mel. as suggested by the mention of the drinking, (as in Jer. xxv. 27.). Ibn Ezra, Tanchum, Abarb. give both. In any case, as in עָשַׂה, the word was probably framed to suggest the two words, into which it is naturally resolved, קָסַךְ, קָסַךְ, like אָסַף אָסַף Is. xxviii. 8. and the image Is. xix. 14. The form is enlarged by Hab. from the previous קָסַךְ, but the doubling occurs in

<sup>13</sup> There is a cup in the Lord's hand; it is full of mixture, and He poureth out therefrom; but the dregs thereof all the ungodly of the earth shall suck them out, shall drink them.

And shameful spewing <sup>14</sup> shall be on thy glory. "With the shame of thy spewing shalt thou bring up all thou hast swallowed down, and from the height of glory shalt thou be brought to the utmost ills." The shame of the ungodly cometh forth from himself; the shame he put others to is doubled upon himself; and the very means which he had used to fill himself with glory and greatness, cover the glory which by nature he had, with the deeper disgrace, so that he should be a loathsome and revolting sight to all. Man veils foul deeds under fair words; God, in His word, unveils the foulness.

Having become beasts, they shared their history. They spoiled, scared, laid waste, were destroyed. "Whoso seeketh to hurt another, hurteth himself." The Chaldeans laid waste Judæa, scared and wasted its inhabitants; the end of its plunder should be, not to adorn, but to cover them, overwhelm them as in ruins, so that they should not lift up their heads again. Violence returns on the head of him who did it; they seem to raise a lofty fabric, but are buried under it. He sums up their past experience, what God had warned them beforehand, what they had found.

He says then, thy wrong to the inhabitants of Lebanon shall overwhelm thee." He gives also the rendering, followed in the E. V., but prefers his own. He gives the two ways of deriving נָשַׂךְ from נָשַׂךְ and נָשַׂךְ. Rashi follows the same construction. the maker thereof hath graven it? What did Baal and Ash-taroath profit you? What availed it ever but to draw down the wrath of God? Even so neither shall it profit the Chaldean. As their idols availed them not, so neither need they fear them. Sennacherib and Nebuchadnezzar were propagandists of their own belief and would destroy, if they could, all other worship, false or true<sup>1</sup>: Nebuchadnezzar is thought to have set up his own image<sup>2</sup>. Anti-Christ will set himself up as God<sup>3</sup>. We may take warning at least by our own sins. If we had no profit at all from them, neither will the like profit others. This the Jews did, in the main, learn in their captivity.

The molten image and teacher of lies. It is all one whether by teacher of lies we understand the idol<sup>4</sup>, or its priest<sup>5</sup>. For its priest gave it its voice, as its maker created its form. It could only seem to teach through the idol-priest. Isaiah used the title teacher of lies, of the false prophet<sup>6</sup>. It is all one. Zechariah combines them; <sup>7</sup> The teraphim have spoken vanity, and the diviners have seen a lie, and have had false dreams.

That the maker of his work trusteth therein. This was the special folly of idolatry. The thing made must needs be inferior to its maker. It was one of the corruptions of idolatry that the maker of his own work should trust in what was wholly his own creation, what, not God, but himself created, what had nothing but what it had from himself<sup>8</sup>. He uses the very words which express the relation of man to God, "the Framer" and "the thing framed." <sup>9</sup> O your perverseness! Shall the framer be accounted as clay, that the thing made should say of its Maker, He made me not, and the thing framed say of its Framer, He hath no hands? The idol-maker is "the creator of his creature," of his god whom he worships. Again the idol-maker makes dumb idols [lit. dumb nothings] in themselves nothings, and having no power out of themselves; and what is uttered in their name, are but lies. And what else are man's idols of wealth, honour, fame, which he makes to himself, the creatures of his own hands or mind, their greatness existing chiefly in his own imagination, before which he bows down himself, who is the image of God?

19. But then the greater is the Woe to him who deceiveth by them. The prophet passes away from the idols as "nothings" and pronounces "woe" on those who deceive by them. He <sup>10</sup> first expostulates with them on their folly, and would awaken them. What hath it profited<sup>11</sup>? Then on the obstinate he denounces "woe." Woe unto him that saith to the wood, Awake; to the dumb stone, Arise. Self-made blindness alone could, in the light of truth, so speak; but yet more lies in the emphatic word, It. The personal pronoun stands emphatically in Hebrew; He shall teach, lo, He (this same of whom he speaks) this is It which shall teach: It, and not the living God. And yet this same It (the word is again emphatic) he points, as with the finger, to it, behold, It is laid over with, held fast by<sup>12</sup>, gold and silver, so that no voice could escape, if it had any. And there is no breath at all in the midst of it<sup>13</sup>, lit. All breath, all which is breath, there is none within it; he first suggests the thought, breath of every sort, and then energetically denies it all<sup>14</sup>; no life of any sort, of man, or bird, or beast, or creeping thing;<sup>15</sup> none, good or bad; from God or from Satan; none whereby it can do good or do evil; for which it should be loved or feared. Evil spirits may have made use of idols: they could not give them life, nor dwell in them.

The words addressed to it are the language of the soul in the seeming absence or silence of God<sup>16</sup>, but mockery as spoken to the senseless stone, as Elijah had mocked the Baal-priests<sup>17</sup>, peradventure he sleepeth and must be awaked.

20. And now having declared the nothingness of all which is not God, the power of man or his gods, he answers again his own question, by summoning all before the Presence of the Majesty of God.

And the Lord. He had, in condemning them, pictured the tumult of the world, the oppressions, the violence, blood-sheddings, covetousness, insolence, self-aggrandisement of the then world-empire, and had denounced woe upon it; we see man framing his idols, praying to the lifeless stones; and God, of Whom none thought, where was He? These were men's ways. "And the Lord," he joins it on, as the complement and corrective of all this confusion, The Lord is in His holy temple, awaiting, in His long-suffering, to judge. The temple of God is where God enshrines Himself, or allows Himself to be seen and adored. "God is wholly every where, the whole of Him no where." There is no contrast between His temple on earth, and His temple in heaven. He is not more locally present in heaven than in earth. It were as anthropomorphic but less pious to think of God, as confined, localised, in heaven as on earth; because it would be simply removing God away from man. Solomon knew, when he built the temple, that the heaven and heaven of heavens could not contain<sup>18</sup> God. The holy temple, which could be destroyed<sup>19</sup>, towards which men were to pray<sup>20</sup>, was the visible temple<sup>21</sup>, where were the symbols of God's Presence, and of the atoning Sacrifice; but lest His presence should be localised, Solomon's repeated prayer is, <sup>22</sup> hear Thou in heaven Thy dwelling place; <sup>23</sup> hear Thou in heaven. There is then no difference, as though in earlier books the "holy temple" meant that at Jerusalem, in the later, "the heavens." In the confession at the offering of the third year's tithes, the

CHAPTER III.

A PRAYER of Habakkuk the prophet upon Shigionoth.
* Ps. 7, title.
|| Or, according to variable songs, or, tunes, called in Hebrew, Shigionoth.

prayer is, <sup>1</sup> look down from Thy holy habitation, from heaven; and David says, <sup>2</sup> the Lord is in His holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven; and, <sup>3</sup> He heard my voice out of His temple—He bowed the heavens also and came down; and, <sup>4</sup> In His temple doth every one say, Glory. The simple words are identical though not in the same order as those, in which David, in the same contrast with the oppression of man, ushers in the judgement and final retribution to good and bad, by declaring the unseen presence of God on His Throne in heaven, beholding and trying the sons of men.

In His Presence, all the mysteries of our being are solved. The Lord is in His holy Temple, not, as the idols in temples made with hands, but revealing Himself in the visible temple, <sup>5</sup> "dwelling in the Son, by Nature and Union, as He saith, <sup>6</sup> The Father Who dwelleth in Me doeth the works; in each one of the bodies and souls of the Saints by His Spirit<sup>7</sup>, in the Blessed, in glory; in the Heavens, by the more evident appearance of His Majesty and the workings of His Power; <sup>8</sup> every where by Essence, Presence, and Power, for in Him we live, and move, and have our being; no where as confined or inclosed." Since then God is in Heaven, beholding the deeds of men, Himself Unchangeable, Almighty, All-holy, let all the earth keep silence before Him, lit. hush before Him all the earth, waiting from Him in hushed stillness the issue of this tangled state of being. And to the hushed soul, hushed to itself and its own thoughts, hushed in awe of His Majesty and His Presence, before His face, God speaks<sup>9</sup>.

III. 1. A prayer<sup>10</sup> of Habakkuk. The prayer of the prophet, in the strictest sense of the word, is contained in the words of verse 2. The rest is, in its form, praise and thanksgiving, chiefly for God's past mercies in the deliverance from Egypt and the entering into the promised land. But thanksgiving is an essential part of prayer, and Hannah is said to have prayed, whereas the hymn which followed is throughout one thanksgiving<sup>11</sup>. In that also these former deliverances were images of things to come, of every deliverance afterwards, and, especially, of that complete Divine deliverance which our Lord Jesus Christ wrought for us from the power of Satan<sup>12</sup>, the whole is one prayer. "Do, O Lord, as Thou hast done of old; forsake not Thine own works. Such were Thy deeds once; fulfil them now, all which they shadowed forth." It is then a prayer for the manifestation of God's power, and therewith the destruction of His enemies, thenceforth to the Day of Judgement. <sup>13</sup> Having completed the discourse about Babylon, and having fore-announced most clearly, that those who destroyed the holy city and carried Israel captive shall be severely punished, he passes suitably to the mystery of Christ, and from the redemption which took place partially in one nation, he carries on the discourse to that universal redemption, whereby the remnant of Israel, and no less the whole world has been saved."

2 O LORD, I have heard † thy speech, and was afraid: O LORD, || <sup>b</sup> revive thy work in the midst of the years, in the midst of the years make known; in wrath remember mercy.

Upon Shigionoth. The title, Shiggaion, occurs but once besides<sup>14</sup>. Upon, in the titles of the Psalms, is used with the instrument<sup>15</sup>, the melody<sup>16</sup>, or the first words of the hymn, whose melody has been adopted<sup>17</sup>. The two first are mentioned by a Jewish Commentator<sup>18</sup> with others, "in his delight," or "his errors," in the sense, that God will forgive them. This, which the versions and Jewish commentators mostly adopt, would be a good sense, but is hardly consistent with the Hebrew usago. Shiggaion of David, as a title of a Psalm, must necessarily describe the Psalm itself, as Midsmor of David, Michtam of David, Tephillah of David, Maschil of David. But Shiggaion, as a "great error," is not a title; nor does it suit the character of the Psalm, which relates to calumny not to error. It probably, then, means a psalm with music expressive of strong emotion, "erratic" or "dithyrambic." Habakkuk's title, on Shigionoth [plur.] then would mean upon, or (as we should say,) "set to" music of psalms of this sort<sup>19</sup>. The number "three" remarkably predominates in this psalm<sup>20</sup>, yet so that long measures are succeeded by very short.

2. O Lord, I have heard i. e. with the inward ear of the heart, Thy speech, (rather as E. M. Thy report, i. e. the report of Thee<sup>21</sup>) i. e. what may be heard and known of God, or, what he had himself heard<sup>22</sup>. The word contains in one both that which God had lately declared to the Prophet, the judgements of God upon the wicked of the people, and upon those who, with their own injustice, wrought on them the righteous judgements of God, and that the work of the Lord would be wrought in His time for those who in patience wait for it; and also still more largely, what might be heard of God, although, as it were, but a little whisper of His greatness and of the Majesty of His workings.

And was afraid, not "fearful" but afraid in awe, as a creature, and amazed at the surpassing wonderfulness of the work of God. Well may man stand in awe <sup>23</sup> at the Incarnation of the Only Begotten Son, how earth should contain Him uncontained by space, how a Body was prepared for Him of the Virgin by the Holy Ghost, and all the works not interchange with Syr. 6.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 6 has 15 words, in five combinations of three words; vv. 8 and 10 have 12 words, in four 3s: vv. 4, 9, 19, have 9 words in three 3s: vv. 5, 12, 15 and 18 have 6 words in two 3s: ver. 17 is divided into 433+33; ver. 8 is 33332; ver. 11 is 423; ver. 16 is 3332223. This forces itself on every reader. Del. quotes the Meor Enaim, i. 60, "The prayer of Habakkuk goeth on threes."

<sup>21</sup> Except in the one phrase שמעתי "hearing of ear" (Job xlii. 5. Ps. xviii. 45.) the personal gen. after שמעתי is that of the object, the report of Jacob, Gen xxix. 18. <sup>19</sup> Since שמעתי "erred" is common to Hebrew and Aramaic, it is improbable that שמעתי should be i. q. Syr. שמעתי a "hymn of praise," from שמעתי, besides that the Heb. שמעתי does whereby He shall work the salvation of mankind, the Cross, the Death, Resurrection and Ascension, uniting things opposite, a Body with One incorporeal, Death with Life, Resurrection with Death, a Body in Heaven. All is full of wonder and awe." "This is not a servile fear, but a holy fear which endureth for ever, not one which love casteth out, but which it bringeth in, wherein angels praise, dominions adore, powers stand in awe at the Majesty of the Eternal God."

O Lord, revive Thy work. God's Word seems, often, as it were, dead and come utterly to an end for evermore<sup>2</sup>, while it is holding on its own course, as all nature seems dead for a while, but all is laid up in store, and ready to shoot forth, as by a sort of resurrection. "The Prophet prophesying prayeth, that it should come quickly, and praying prophesieth that it shall so come." All God's dealings with His people, His Church, each single soul, are part of one great work, perfect in itself<sup>3</sup>; glory and majesty<sup>4</sup>; all which the godly meditateth on<sup>5</sup>; which those busied with their own plans, do not look to<sup>6</sup>; it is manifested in great doings for them or with them, as in the Exodus the Psalmist says, "We have heard with our ears, yea, our fathers have told us what work Thou didst in their days, in the times of old;"<sup>7</sup> "They proved Me and saw My work;" with it He makes His own glad<sup>8</sup>; after it has been withdrawn for a while, He sheweth it to His servants<sup>10</sup>; it issues in judgements on the ungodly, which men consider and declare<sup>11</sup>.

The great work of God on earth, which includes all His works and is the end of all, is the salvation of man through Jesus Christ. This great work seemed, as it were, asleep, or dead, as trees in winter, all through those 4000 years, which gave no token of His Coming. Included in this great work is the special work of the Hand of God, of which alone it is said, God said, Let Us make man in Our Image after Our Likeness<sup>12</sup>; and, we are the clay and Thou our Potter, and we are all the work of Thy Hands<sup>13</sup>; and Thy Hands have made me and fashioned me together round about<sup>14</sup>,—man; whom, being dead as to the life of the soul through the malice of Satan, Christ revived by dying and rising again. He was dead in trespasses and sins, and like a carcase putrefying in them, and this whole world one great charnel-house, through man's manifold corruptions, when Christ came to awaken the dead, and they who heard lived<sup>15</sup>.

Again, the Centre of this work, the special Work of God, that wherein He made all things new, is the Human Body of our Lord, the Temple which was destroyed by Death, and within three days raised up.

The answer to Habakkuk's enquiry, How long? had two sides. It had given assurance as to the end. The trial-time would not be prolonged for one moment longer than the counsel of God had foredetermined. The relief would come, come; it would not be behindhand. But meantime? There was no comfort to be given. For God knew that deepening sin was drawing on deepening chastisement. But in that He was silent as to the intervening time and pointed to patient expectation of a lingering future, as their only comfort, He implies that the immediate future was heavy. Habakkuk then renews his prayer for the years which had to intervene and to pass away. In the midst of the years, before that time appointed<sup>16</sup>, when His promise should have its full fulfilment, before those years should come to their close, he prays; revive Thy work. The years include all the long period of waiting for our Lord's first Coming before He came in the Flesh; and now for His second Coming and the restitution of all things. In this long period, at times God seems to be absent, as when our Lord was asleep in the boat, while the tempest was raging; at times He bids the storm to cease and there is a great calm. This, in those long intervals, when God seems to be absent, and to leave all things to time and chance, and love waxes cold, and graces seem rare, is the prayer of Habakkuk, of Prophets and Psalmists, of the Church, "Return, we beseech Thee, O God of hosts, look down from heaven, behold and visit this vine." "O God, why hast Thou cast us off for ever? Why withdrawest Thou Thy hand, Thy right hand? For God is my king of old, working salvation in the midst of the earth." "Awake, awake, put on strength, Thou Arm of the Lord; awake, as in the ancient days, in the generations of old. Art thou not It which did smite Rahab, didst wound the dragon? Art thou not It which didst dry the sea, the waters of the great deep, which didst make the depths of the sea a way for the ransomed to pass over?" "Stir up Thy might and come, save us." "Renew our days, as of old." So our Lord taught His Church to pray continually, whenever she prayed, Thy kingdom come, longing not for His final Coming only, but for the increase of His glory, and the greater dominion of His grace, and His enthronement in the hearts of men, even before its complete and final Coming. In the midst of the years revive Thy work, is the Church's continual cry.

In the midst of the years make known, lit. Thou wilt make known: in wrath Thou wilt remember mercy; and so (as we use the word wilt) the Prophet, at once, foretelleth, expresseth his faith, prayeth. God had made known His work and His power in the days of old. In times of trouble He seems like a God who hideth Himself. Now, he prays Him to shine forth and help; make known Thy work, before Thou fulfil it, to revive the drooping hopes of man, and that all may see that Thy word is truth. Make Thyself known in Thy work, that, when the time cometh to make an end of sin by the Death of Thy Son, Thy Awful Holiness, and the love wherewith Thou hast so loved the world, may be the more known and adored.

In wrath Thou wilt remember mercy. So David prayed, "Remember Thy tender mercies and Thy loving-kindnesses; for they are from old. Thou wilt remember that counsel for man's redemption which has been from the foundation of the world: for we seem in our own minds to be forgotten of God, when He delayeth to help us. God remembereth mercy<sup>25</sup> in anger, in that in this life He never chastens without purposes of mercy, and His Mercy ever softeneth His judgements. His Promise of mercy, that the Seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head, went before the sentence of displeasure, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." "He reveals His wrath that He may scare us from sin and so may not inflict it;" and when at last He inflicteth it, He hath mercy on the remnant who flee to His Mercy, that we be not like Sodom and Gomorrha. "While we were yet sinners, and God was wroth, Christ died for us, and He saved us, not for works which we had done, but out of His great Mercy, and took away sin, and restored us to life and incorruption."

3 God came from || Teman, °and the
|| Or, the south. °Deut. 33. 2. Judg. 5. 4. Ps. 68. 7.

God had already promised by Micah, <sup>1</sup> According to the days of thy coming out of the land of Egypt, I will show him marvellous things. Isaiah had often used the great events of that deliverance as the symbols of the future. So now Habakkuk, in one vast panorama, as it were, without distinction of time or series of events, exhibits the future in pictures of the past. In the description itself which follows, he now speaks in the past, now in the future; of which times the future might be a vivid present; and the past a prophetic past. As a key to the whole, he says, God shall come, indicating that all which follows, however spoken, was a part of that future. In no other way was it an answer to that prayer, Revive Thy work. To foretell future deliverances in plain words, had been a comfort; it would have promised a continuance of that work. The unity and revival of the work is expressed, in that the past is made, as it was, the image of the future. That future was to be wondrous, superhuman; else the past miracles had been no image of it. It was to be no mere repetition of the future; and to mark this, the images are exhibited out of their historical order.

3. God came (lit. shall come) from Teman. God shall come, as He came of old, clothed with majesty and power; but it was not mere power. The centre of the whole picture is, as Micah and Isaiah had prophesied that it was to be, a new revelation; <sup>2</sup> The law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. <sup>3</sup> I will give Thee for a covenant to the people [Israel], for a light of the Gentiles. So now, speaking of the new work in store, Habakkuk renews the imagery in the Song of Moses<sup>4</sup>, in Deborah's Song<sup>5</sup>, and in David<sup>6</sup>; but there the manifestation of His glory is spoken of wholly in time past, and Mount Sinai is named. Habakkuk speaks of that coming as yet to be, and omits the express mention of Mount Sinai, which was the emblem of the law<sup>7</sup>. And so he directs us to another Lawgiver, Whom God should raise up like unto Moses, yet with a law of life, and tells how He Who spake the law, God, shall come in likeness of our flesh.

<sup>12</sup> Mount Paran is only mentioned in Deuteronomy and Habakkuk, and was probably taken by Habakkuk from Moses, who himself knew it. The wilderness of Paran must have lain W. or S. of the wilderness of Zin, which formed the Southern border of Judah (Nu. xiii. 21. Josh. xv. 1.). The history of Ishmael implies that part of it lay towards Egypt (Gen. xii. 21.); that of Haddad the Edomite, shews that it lay between Midian and Egypt (1 Kgs. xi. 18); but there being, (as far as it is ascertained), no natural boundary between it and the wilderness of Zin, the name Paran is apparently used in a wider sense as comprehending the desert of Zin, whence Kadesh is placed both in Paran (Nu. xiii. 26.) and more commonly in Zin (Nu. xx. 1, xxvii. 14, xxxiii. 36, 37, xxxiv. 4, Josh. v. 3.), and the wilderness near it is also called the wilderness of Kadesh (Ps. xxix. 8). The name of the wilderness of Zin does not occur after Joshua; and that of Paran may have extended over the whole desert cretaceous plateau up to the borders of Edom, now called Badiet-et-Tih, the "wilderness of the wanderings," whose Western extremity lies North of the crescent-shaped Jebel-et-Tih, which separates it from the lower part of the peninsula. (See Map in Sinaitic survey.) Hence Nabal is related to have fed his flocks in Paran (1 Sam. xxv. 6.) and Eil-paran "the terebinth of Paran," (Gen. xiv. 6.) by the wilderness, the bound of the inroad of Chedorlaomer, may have had its name from the wilderness. Mount Paran might be anywhere connected with this wilderness on the West. "Mount Serbal is perhaps the most striking mountain in the peninsula; it rises abruptly to a height of more than 4000 feet above the valleys at its base, and its summit, a sharp ridge about three miles long, is broken into a series of peaks varying little in altitude, but rivaling each other in the beauty and grandeur of their outline. It is three miles from Wady Feiran," "in one or two points from which its highest peak is visible." Ordnance Survey of Peninsula of Sinai pp. 143, 144. "When seen from a distance Serbal presents a boldness of outline and an appearance of massive isolation which entitled it to rank as one of the grandest and most distinctive features of the peninsula." (Palmer's desert of the Exodus p. 169.) What is now called Jebel Feiran is too low to be taken into account. It is

And the Holy One from Mount Paran. In the earliest passage three places are mentioned, in which or from which the glory of God was manifested; with this difference however, that it is said, <sup>8</sup> The Lord came from Sinai, but His glory arose, as we should say dawned<sup>9</sup> unto them from Seir, and flashed forth<sup>10</sup> from Mount Paran<sup>11</sup>. Seir and Mount Paran are joined together by the symbol of the light which dawned or shone forth from them. In the second passage, the Song of Deborah, Seir and the field of Edom are the place whence God came forth; Sinai melted<sup>12</sup> at His presence. In the 68th Psalm the mention of Edom is dropped; and the march through the wilderness under the leading of God, is alone mentioned, together with the shaking of Sinai. In Habakkuk, the contrast is the same as in Moses; only Teman stands in place of Seir<sup>13</sup>. Teman and Mount Paran are named probably, as the two opposed boundaries of the journeyings of Israel through the desert. They came to Mount Sinai through the valley, now called Wady Feiran<sup>14</sup> or Paran; Edom was the bound of their wanderings to their promised land<sup>15</sup>. God Who guided, fed, protected them from the beginning, led them to the end. Between Paran also and Edom or Teman was the gift of the Spirit to the seventy, which was the shadow of the day of Pentecost; there, was the brazen serpent lifted up, the picture of the healing of the Cross<sup>16</sup>. If Mount Paran be near Kadesh, then Moses in the opening of his song describes the glory of God as manifested from that first revelation of His law on Mount Sinai; then in that long period of Israel's waiting there to its final departure for the promised land, when Mount Hor was consecrated and God's awful Holiness declared in the death of Aaron.

He Who shall come, is God<sup>17</sup>, the Holy One (a proper Name of God<sup>18</sup>). Perfect in Holiness, as God, the Son of God, and as Man also all-holy, with a human will, always exactly accompanying the Divine Will, which was but an eminence, rising on one side 810 feet above the Wady Feiran; on the other side, 795 feet, and above the sea 2800; so that in the same neighbourhood Mount Serbal is above twice its height, 6443 feet above the sea at its highest peak. (Sinaitic Survey, Mount Serbal, sections.) This mountain has this advantage, that it is connected with Wady Feiran or Paran, through which Moses led Israel to Mount Sinai. The name is remarkable, as having been given by Israel, since it has a Hebrew etymology, "the beautiful" or "the leafy," and all travellers praise the richness of the valley, even amid the decay of fertility consequent on neglect. It has no Arabic etymology. (See Palmer, l. c. p. 20.) S. Jerome says, from his Hebrew teacher apparently, "Paran is a place near to Mount Sinai." ad loc.

The striking mountain of Edom had its own name Hor, which in the eleven places in which it is named in the Pentateuch is always called הר הור "Hor, the mountain." Nu. xx. 22, 23, 25, 27, xxi. 4, xxxii. 37, 38, 41, xxxiv. 7, 8, De. xxxii. 19. Prof. Palmer having shewn Atin Gadis to be Kadesh (l. c. iv. p. 373. sqq.) says, "To one encamped in the wilderness of Kadesh, i. e. in the open plain into which Wady Gadis debouches, Jebel Magrah would be always the most conspicuous object in the scene." (Ib. p. 510.) This is a plateau, 70 miles long and 40–50 miles broad, "projecting into the Tih, much as the Tih projects into Sinai." Ib. p. 288, 9.

<sup>17</sup> The sing. אלהים occurs 41 times in the book of Job; else only 16 times in all the O. T., and 8 times only of the true God, (twice in Moses' song Deut. xxxii. 15, 17; in a Psalm of David, Ps. cxxxix. 19, of Asaph, l. 22, Anon. Ps. cxiv. 7; in Proverbs xxx. 6, here, and in Nehemiah's prayer, (in which there are so many reminiscences from the Pentateuch. See in "Daniel the Prophet" pp. 356, 357.) Else it is used of the Godhead (Who is God except &c. in David Ps. xviii. 32, is there any God besides Me? Is. xlv. 8); "any God" including the true God Dan. xi. 3. And five times it is used of a false god; in Hab. i. 11; three times in Dan. xi. 38, 39; and by Sennacherib 2 Chr. xxxii. 15. There is then no basis of induction as to its occurring in later Hebrew and poetic books; since its use is mostly a peculiarity of the book of Job, the other 16 cases are sporadic and in no one sense.

On this there follows a pause denoted by Selah<sup>1</sup>, (which occurs thrice according to the mystery of that number,) that the soul may dwell on the greatness of the majesty and mercy of God.

Selah. There is no doubt as to the general purport of the word, that it is a musical direction, that there should be a pause, the music probably continuing alone, while the mind rested on the thought, which had just been presented to it; our "interlude<sup>2</sup>." It is always placed at some pause of thought, even when not at the end of a strophe, or, as twice in this hymn<sup>3</sup>, at the end of the verse. S. Gregory of Nyssa modifies this thought, supposing "Selah" to express a pause made by the writer, that "while the psalmody, with which David's prophesying was accompanied, went on in its course, another illumining of the Holy Spirit, and an addition to the gift according to knowledge, came for the benefit of those who received the prophecy, he, holding in his verse, gave time for his mind to receive the knowledge of the thought, which took place in him from the Divine illumining." He defines it to be "a sudden silence in the midst of the Psalmody for the reception of the illumining."

His Glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of His praise. This is plainly no created glory, but anticipates the Angelic Hymn, <sup>5</sup> Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men, or, as the Seraphim sing first, glory to God in Heaven, <sup>6</sup> Holy Holy Holy is the Lord God of Sabaoth, and then, the whole earth is full of His glory; and Uncreated Wisdom saith, <sup>7</sup> I alone compassed the circuit of Heaven, and walked in the bottom of the deep. Nor are they our material heavens, much less this lowest heaven over our earth, nor is His glory any lightning at Mount Sinai, but the boundless Majesty<sup>8</sup> of God, which rules, encompasses, fills, penetrates the orbs of heaven and all its inhabitants, and yet is not enclosed nor bounded thereby. Those who are made as the heavens by the indwelling of God He spiritually covers, filling<sup>9</sup> them with the light of glory and splendour of grace and brightness of wisdom, as it saith, Is there any number of His armies, and upon whom doth not His light arise<sup>10</sup>? and so the earth was full of His praise, i. e. the Church militant spread throughout the world, as in the Psalm, <sup>11</sup> The Lord's name is praised from the rising up of the sun unto the going down of the same, and, <sup>12</sup> O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth, Who hast set Thy glory above the heavens.

4. And His Brightness, that wherein God dwelleth, <sup>13</sup> the brightness of the Lord's glory, before which darkness fleeth<sup>14</sup>, was as the light, or as the sun. Out of the midst of the darkness, wherewith God, as it were, <sup>15</sup> hid Himself, the Brightness of the inapproachable Light wherein He dwelleth, gleams forth<sup>16</sup>, bright as the brightest light gathered into one, which man knows of and whereon he cannot gaze. So amid the darkness of the humiliation of His Presence in the flesh, <sup>17</sup> we beheld His Glory, the Glory as of the Only-Begotten of the Father; and <sup>18</sup> the people that walked in darkness see a great light, "not dim<sup>19</sup> nor weak, nor shadowed, like that of Moses, but pure unimaginable light of the knowledge of God." The Brightness too of His Flesh was like the light of the Godhead on Mount Tabor; for the Godhead flashed through. <sup>20</sup> As often as He did His marvellous works, He put forth His Brightness (tempered for His creatures, since they could not approach the depth of His light, yet) as light to enlighten men to know Him. Yet the Brightness issues from the Light, co-existing with it, and in it, while issuing from it. And so the words aptly express, how He Who is the <sup>21</sup> Brightness of the Father's Glory and the express Image of His Person, the <sup>22</sup> Brightness of the Eternal Light, the unspotted mirror of the Power of God, and the Image of His Goodness, is as the Light from Whom He is, <sup>23</sup> Light of Light, Equal to the Father by Whom He was Begotten; as S. John says, <sup>24</sup> That was the true Light, which lighteneth every man that cometh into the world. As He prayeth, <sup>25</sup> Glorify Thou Me with Thine Own Self with the Glory Which I had with Thee before the world was.

He had horns coming out of His Hand. <sup>26</sup> Horns are everywhere in Holy Scripture the emblem of strength." It may be, that here "rays" are likened to horns, as the face of Moses is said, with the same image, to have "sent forth rays<sup>27</sup>" after he had long been in the presence of God. So it may be a mingled image of the Glory and might; Light, which was also might. But "horns," though they may be a symbol of "light," are not of "lightning;" and the Hand of God is used as an emblem of His Power, His protection, His bounty, His constraining force on His prophets. It is nowhere used of the side or sides<sup>28</sup>. We have two images combined here; "horns" which in every other place in which they are used as a metaphor, is an emblem of power; and "from the hand of" which, wherever it is used of a person, means that the thing spoken of had been in his hand or power really or virtually<sup>29</sup>. Both then combine in the meaning that the might came forth from the directing agency of God Who wielded it.

Tanch. Abendana. This is illustrated further by the use of "horns" as a hieroglyphic for the sun, Champollion Grammar p. 359. in Ges. and קרנא "horns" of the sun, Buxt. (not in Levy). The title of Ps. xxii. על אֵלֶּיךָ הַשֶּׁמֶשׁ "according to the hind of the morning," may bear upon it, since אֵלֶּיךָ הַשֶּׁמֶשׁ in the Jerus. Talm. (originally quoted by Lightfoot, Horæ Hebr. on S. Mark xvi. 2) is used of the first rays of light, which usher in the dawn, the rays appearing solid like horns. In Arab. too قُرْشَان is a name of the sun, though Arab. authorities differ about its use, and قُرْشَان is the "sun at the time called قُرْشَان," some part of the clear day. And Hariri uses "the horn of the gazelle" قُرْشَان (as explained by De Sacy) of those same first rays. But Kim. gives as the meanings of אֵלֶּיךָ הַשֶּׁמֶשׁ hind (literally) or day-star, or sunrise.

There is equally no instance of the form from כָּס (as Ewald Ps. i. 179, Lehrs. §. 216. c. p. 544) since כָּס is 1 Kgs. ii. 40, is only a Var. When then did light or might, which lay, as it were, before in the Hand of God, go forth from it? For the Hand of God is always symbolic of His might, whether put forth, or for the time laid up in it. The form of the words remarkably corresponds to those of Moses, in the preface to the blessing on the tribes, which Habakkuk had in mind, <sup>1</sup> From His right hand was a fiery law for them, and S. Paul says that the glory of Moses' face which he received from the Presence of God, was a symbol of the glory of the law. <sup>2</sup> The ministration of death written and engraven on stone was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance. The law, being given by God, had a majesty of its own. The Psalms bear witness to its power in converting, enwisening, rejoicing, enlightening the soul<sup>3</sup>. They in whose heart it was, none of their steps slid<sup>4</sup>. The whole 119th Psalm is one varied testimony of its greatness and its power. It was a guide on the way; it was a schoolmaster unto Christ<sup>5</sup>, by Whom it was fulfilled. But itself bare witness of the greater glory which should come forth from the Hand of God. <sup>6</sup> If that which is done away were glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious. <sup>7</sup> "The horn signifieth power, when it is spoken of God the Father exhibiting to us God the Son: <sup>8</sup> He hath raised up a horn of salvation for us, and again, <sup>9</sup> His horn shall be exalted in honour. For all things which were marvellously done were glorious. The Only-Begotten came then in our form, and, in regard to the Flesh and the Manhood, enduring the appearance of our weakness, but, as God, invisible in might and easily subduing whom He willed."

And what has been the weapon of His warfare, whereby He has subdued the might of Satan and the hearts of men, but the horns of His Cross, whereto His Sacred Hands were once fastened by the sharp nails, where was the hiding of His Power, when His Almightyness lay hid in His Passion<sup>10</sup>, and He was <sup>11</sup> a worm and no man; a reproach of men and the despised of the people? Now it is the Sceptre laid upon His Shoulder<sup>12</sup>, the ensign and trophy of His rule, the Rod of His Strength<sup>13</sup>, terrible to devils, salvation to man. In it lay His might, although concealed, as He said, <sup>14</sup> I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me. His Might was lodged there, although hidden. It was the hiding-place of His power. The Cross was <sup>15</sup> to the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks foolishness; but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ Crucified was the Power of God and the Wisdom of God. Through the Cross was <sup>16</sup> all power given to Him both in Heaven and earth. <sup>17</sup> There was given Him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve Him. From Him shall go forth all power in earth; by His Hands shall be given the vacant thrones in Heaven, as He saith, <sup>18</sup> To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My Throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with My Father in His Throne. There too was the hiding of His Power, in that there, in His Cross, is our shelter<sup>19</sup>, and in His pierced Side our hiding-place, where we may take refuge from Satan and our sins; for therein is Power. <sup>20</sup> Neither shall any pluck them out of My Hand. Light and darkness ever meet in God. His inapproachable light is darkness to eyes which would gaze on it. <sup>21</sup> He covereth Himself with Light as with a garment. His light is the very veil which hideth Him. His Light is darkness to those who pry into Him and His Nature; His darkness is light to those who by faith behold Him. He emptied Himself<sup>22</sup> and hid Himself; He hid the power of His Godhead in the weakness of the Manhood, and so <sup>23</sup> He Who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the Face of Jesus Christ. <sup>24</sup> "In the Cross was for a while His might hidden, when He said to His Father, <sup>25</sup> My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death, and, Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me, and on the Cross itself, <sup>26</sup> Father, into Thy Hands I commend My Spirit."

And burning coals (rather, as E. M., burning fever<sup>30</sup>) went forth at His Feet, i.e., followed Him. Messengers of death went as it were before Him, as the front of His army, and the rear thereof was other forms of death<sup>31</sup>. Death and destruction of all sorts are a great army at His command, going before Him as heralds of His Coming, (such as are judgements in this world) or attendants upon Him, at the Judgement when He appeareth<sup>32</sup> in His Kingdom, when <sup>33</sup> they shall gather out of His Kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire.

Right Hand of God; and Isaiah saith, <sup>1</sup> The Lord standeth up to plead, and standeth to judge the people. He had not need to go forth, but, in the abode of His glory, He stood and beheld and with His Eye measured the earth, as His own, whereas, before the Cross, it lay under <sup>2</sup> the Prince of this world, and he had said, <sup>3</sup> it is delivered unto me, and unto whomsoever I will, I give it. He measured it, and gave it to His Apostles, <sup>4</sup> All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth. Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature, and, <sup>5</sup> their sound is gone out into all lands, and their words into the ends of the world. He measured it also, surveying and weighing all who dwell therein, their persons, qualities, deeds, good or bad, to requite them, as Judge of quick and dead; as David cast down Moab and measured them with a line, <sup>6</sup> to put to death and to keep alive.

He beheld, and drove asunder the nations, or, made the nations to tremble<sup>7</sup>. When Israel came out of Egypt and God divided the Red sea before them, they sang, <sup>8</sup> The people shall hear and be afraid; terror shall take hold of the inhabitants of Palestina; the mighty men of Moab, trembling shall take hold of them; all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away; fear and dread shall fall on them; by the greatness of Thy power they shall be still as a stone. Fear and awe were to be renewed. All nearness of God brings terror to sinful man. When the news came through the wise men, that they had <sup>9</sup> seen in the East the star of Him Who was born, King of the Jews, not Herod the King only was troubled, but all Jerusalem with him. Pilate <sup>10</sup> was afraid when he condemned Him: the High Priests wondered whereunto this should grow, and expostulated, <sup>11</sup> ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and intend to bring this Man's blood upon us. Heathendom was as a beleaguered city, mastered by an ubiquitous Presence, which they knew not how to meet. <sup>12</sup> The state is beset: the Christians are in their fields, in their forts, in their islands. Every sex, age condition, and now even rank is going over to this sect. The fierceness of the persecutions was the measure of their fear. They put forth all human might to stamp out the spark, lest their gods, and the greatness of the empire which they ascribed to their gods, should fall before this unknown power.

And the everlasting mountains were scattered; the perpetual hills did bow; all power, great or small, gave way before Him. All which withstood was scattered asunder, all which in pride lifted itself up was brought low, although before the coming of the Saviour it had ever gone with neck erect, and none could humble its pride. There is something so marvellous about those ancient mountains. There they stood before man was on the earth; they are so solid, man so slight; they have survived so many generations of man; they will long survive us; they seem as if they would stand for ever; the apter symbol how nothing should stand before the might of God. To the greater pride the heavier lot is assigned; the mountains lifted on high above the earth and, as it were, looking down upon it, are scattered or dispersed, as when a stone flieth in pieces under the stroke of the hammer. The "hills" are bowed down only; and this may be the pride of man humbled under the yoke of Christ.

His Ways are Everlasting. "Everlasting" is set over against "everlasting." The "everlasting" of the creature, that which had been as long as creation had been, co-existing with its whole duration, its most enduring parts, are as things past and gone; the everlasting mountains, the hills of eternity, have been scattered in pieces and bowed, and are no more. Over against these stands the ever-present eternity of God. His ways are everlasting, ordered everlastingly, existing everlastingly in the Divine Mind, and, when in act among us, without change in Him. The prophet blends in these great words, things seemingly contrary, ways which imply progress, eternity which is unchangeable. <sup>13</sup> God ever worketh, and ever resteth; unchangeable, yet changing all; He changeth His works, His purpose unchanged. <sup>14</sup> For Thou art Most High, and art not changed, neither in Thee doth to-day come to a close; yet in Thee it doth come to a close; because all such things also are in Thee. For they had no way to pass away, unless Thou heldest them together. And since Thy years fail not, Thy years are one To-day. How many of our's and our fathers' years have flowed away through Thy to-day; and from it received the measure and the mould of such being as they had; and still others shall flow away, and so receive the mould of their degree of being. But Thou art still the Same; and all things of to-morrow, and all beyond, and all of yesterday, and all behind it, Thou wilt do in this to-day, Thou hast done in this to-day."

To these His goings, a highway is made by the breaking down of all which exalted itself, as Isaiah had said, <sup>15</sup> The loftiness of man shall be bowed down, and the haughtiness of men shall be made low, and the Lord Alone shall be exalted in that day; and, The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low.

<sup>17</sup> The Everlasting ways of the Everlasting God are Mercy and Truth,—by these Ways are the hills of the world and the proud demons, the princes of the darkness of this world, bowed down, who knew not the way of mercy and truth nor remembered Its paths. What hath he to do with truth, who is a liar and the father of it, and of whom it is written, he abode not in the Truth? But how far he is from Mercy, our misery witnesseth, inflicted on us by him. When was he ever merciful, who was a murderer from the beginning?—So then those swelling hills were bowed down from the Everlasting Ways, when through their own crookedness they sunk away from the straight ways of the Lord, and became not so much ways as precipices. How much more prudently and wisely are other hills bowed down and humbled by these ways to salvation! For they were not bowed from them, as parting from their straightness, but the Everlasting Ways themselves bowed down. May we not now see the hills of the world bowed down, when those who are high and mighty with devoted submission bow themselves before the Lord, and worship at His Feet? Are they not bowed down, when from their own destructive loftiness of vanity and cruelty, they are turned to the humble way of mercy and truth?"

7 I saw (in prophetic vision<sup>1</sup>), the tents of Cushan in (lit. under) affliction. On the Coming of the Lord there follows the visitation of those alien from Him<sup>2</sup>. Cushan-Rishathaim was the first, whose ambition God overruled to chasten His people<sup>3</sup>. It has been remarked<sup>4</sup>, that as king of Aram-Naharaim or North Mesopotamia, he was probably sovereign of the Aram, from which Balak king of Moab, allied with Midian, sent for Balaam to curse Israel. Midian was the last enemy who, at the very entrance of the promised land, seduced God's people into idolatry and foul sin and lusts. Midian became then the object of the wrath of God<sup>5</sup>. They were also among the early oppressors of Israel, leaving no sustenance for Israel, neither sheep nor ox nor ass, driving them for refuge to dwell in the dens and the mountains, caves and fastnesses, consuming the produce of their land like locusts, so that he whom God raised up as their subduer, was threshing even in a wine-press to hide it from them. Both the kingdom of Aram-Naharaim and Midian disappear from history after those great defeats. Midian, besides its princes, lost, by mutual slaughter, one hundred and twenty thousand men who drew sword. It left its name as a proverb for the utter destruction of those who sought to exterminate the people of God. Do unto them as unto the Midianites;—make them and their princes like Oreb and Zeeb; all their princes as Zebah and as Zalmunrah, who said, let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession. It was an exterminating warfare, which rolled back on those who waged it. So Isaiah sums up an utter breaking-off of the yoke and the rod of the oppressor, as being as in the day of Midian. The same word, aven, is nothingness, iniquity, and the fruit of iniquity, trouble<sup>10</sup>, (since iniquity is emptiness and opposed to that which is, God and His Goodness, and ends in sorrow); so then Cushan is seen as lying as all sinners do, weighed down by and under what is very "emptiness." Tents and curtains are emblems of what shall pass away, under which the wicked shelter themselves from the troubles of this present life, as from heat and rain, "but which<sup>11</sup> in themselves decay, and are consumed by fire." The curtains of Midian tremble. The prophet uses the present to shew that he was not speaking of any mere past terror, but of that terror, which should still seize those opposed to God. The word "wrath" "rogez" echoes through the hymn<sup>12</sup>; here the wicked tremble, "virgezu," under it, to perish; afterwards the Prophet<sup>13</sup>, to live.

Often as Cush or Ethiopia is mentioned in the Old Testament, and in twelve of the sacred writers, Historians, Psalmists, Prophets; from Genesis to Esther (Moses, Job, Chronicles, Esther, David (Ps. lxxviii.), sons of Corah (Ps. lxxxvii.), Amos, Nahum, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Ethiopians by Daniel, it is uniformly Cush not Cushan. Cush also is retained in Ch. and Syr. and was the name in use in the time of Josephus (Ant. i. 62.) One cannot then doubt, that Jon. and the Talmud (Sanh. 106 in Delitzsch) were right in regarding Cushan as designating him who is so called in the Holy Scriptures, not Ethiopia, which is never so called. Prophet asks the question thrice, as to the two miracles of the dividing of the Red Sea and the river Jordan, thereby the more earnestly declaring, that God meant somewhat by these acts and beyond them. He asks, as Daniel<sup>14</sup> and Zechariah<sup>15</sup> asked, what was the truth of the things which they saw. God's dealings with His former people were as much ensamples of what should be with us<sup>16</sup>, as the visions shewn to the prophets. Hereafter too, there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring; there shall be deepening plagues upon the sea and the rivers and fountains of waters; and every living soul in the sea shall die<sup>18</sup>. But God's purpose therein aforetime was not as to the sea or the rivers, but for the salvation of His elect; so shall it be to the end. Mighty as may be the mighty waves of the sea which lift themselves up against the Lord, mightier on high is the Lord<sup>19</sup>. "20 As Thou didst dry up the Jordan and the Red sea, fighting for us; for Thou wert not wroth with the rivers or the sea, nor could things without sense offend Thee; so now mounting Thy chariots, and taking Thy bow, Thou wilt give salvation to Thy people; and the oaths which Thou swarest to our fathers and the tribes, Thou wilt fulfil for ever."

Thou didst ride upon Thy horses, as though God set His army, the Hosts which do His pleasure, against the armies of earth, as the Prophet's servant had his eyes opened to see, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha. "20 Yet amidst so many thousands of horses and chariots, there was no rider; He was the Rider and Ruler of those horses, of Whom the Psalmist says, Thou that sittest above the Cherubim, shew Thyself. With such horses and such chariots was Elijah also taken up into Heaven."

And Thy chariots of salvation, lit. Thy chariots are salvation. Not, as in human armies, except as far as they are the armies of God, to destruction. The end of God's armies, His visitations and judgements, is the salvation of His elect, even while they who are inwardly dead, perish outwardly also. Nor, again, do they prepare for the deliverance for which He intends them, With God, to will is to do. His chariots are salvation. His help is present help. His chariots are the tokens and channels of His Presence to aid. And so, they who bore His Name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel, chosen vessels to bear it, are, in a yet fuller sense, His chariots, which are salvation. They "20 are holy souls, upon which the word of God cometh, to save them and others by them." I have compared thee, saith the Spouse, to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots. However holy the soul, yet compared to God, it is like the chariot of Pharaoh; and a beast, yet still a beast, before Thee<sup>25</sup>. Yet such an one, as endowed with might and ready obedience, and swiftness and nobleness to bear the word of God, and through His might Whom they bore, not their own, nor making it their own, bearing down every thing which opposed itself. "1 The object of the Prophet, is to shew that the second dispensation is better and more glorious, and of incomparably better things than the old. For of old He led Israel forth, through the bodily service of Moses, changing into blood the rivers of Egypt, and doing signs and wonders; then dividing the Red Sea, and carrying over the redeemed, and choking in the waters the most warlike of the Egyptians. But when the Only-Begotten Word of God became Man, He withdrew the whole human race under heaven from the tyranny of Satan, not changing rivers into blood, nor pouring forth His anger upon waters, nor dividing waves of the sea, nor bringing destruction upon men, but rather destroying the murderous Serpent himself, and taking away the sin which had been invented by him and for him, and loosing the unconquered might of death, and calling all to the knowledge of God, through the holy Apostles, who, running forth their course under the whole Heaven and bearing about the Name of Christ, were very rightly had in admiration. He saith then, O Lord, most worthy to be heard are those things, of which Thou hast Thyself been the Doer, and what Thou hast anew wrought is far better than what Thou didst through Moses. For Thou wilt not inflict wrath on rivers, nor shew Thy might on the sea; not in these things will Thy Divine and marvellous power gleam forth, but Thou wilt ride upon Thy horses, and Thy chariots are Salvation. What may these horses be? The Blessed Disciples, Apostles and Evangelists, they who took on them wholly the yoke of all His Divine will, they, the noble, the obedient, ready for all things, whatsoever should please Him; who had Christ to sit upon them, whereof one is the Blessed Paul, of whom Himself saith, <sup>2</sup>He is a chosen vessel unto Me, to hear My Name before the Gentiles. Of fiery speed were these Horses, encompassing the whole earth; so then the chariots of God are said to be ten thousand times ten thousand<sup>3</sup>. For countless, each in their times, and after them, became leaders of the people, and subjected the neck of the understanding to the yoke of the Saviour, and bare about His Glory throughout the whole earth, and rightly divided the word of truth, and subdued the whole earth, as with the speed of horsemen."

His chariots are salvation; <sup>4</sup>"1 for they ran not in vain, but to save cities and countries and nations together, Christ overthrowing the empires of devils, who, so to speak, divided among themselves the whole earth, subduing its dwellers to their own will."

The other meaning, weeks, which occurs 9 times (chiefly of the "feast of weeks," four times in De. xvi.), is plainly irrelevant here. שבועות occurs 24 times besides of the tribes of Israel; twice only of the "rods" set against that of Aaron (Ex. vii. 12, Nu. xvii. 21.). קָרָה "speech" is used of the "promise of God," certainly Ps. lxxvii. 9. The construction is likewise easy, שבועות is the gen. of the obj. after שבועות, and both in apposition with the preceding clause, and קָרָה with them. for emphasis. Lit. (In) nakedness<sup>4</sup> it was laid naked; the sheath being laid aside and cast away, as Isaiah says, <sup>5</sup>Kir laid bare the shield. The <sup>6</sup>bow represents the threat of the vengeance of Almighty God, from which it is at length discharged, if not turned aside; the longer the string is drawn, the sharper issueth the arrow. So then the more the coming of the day of judgement is delayed, the stricter is the severity of the judgement then issuing. So long as judgement is delayed, the bow seems laid up in its sheath. God's judgements mostly strike suddenly <sup>7</sup>as with a swift arrow, because men regard them not, coming from a bow at a distance which they see not. His more signal judgements He makes bare in sight of all.

According to the oath of [to] the tribes; <sup>8</sup>the oath which He swore unto our father Abraham, which oath He often renewed to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and again to David<sup>9</sup>. This oath, the word and promise of God, was the pledge of the deliverance of His people, that they should be saved from their enemies, and from the hand of all that hate them. It lay, as it were, covered and hid, so long as God completed it not. Selah. A pause followeth, wherein to meditate on all which is contained in the word or promise of God, which is all time and eternity.

Thou didst cleave the earth with [i. e., into] rivers. Sea and river had become dry land for the passing through of God's people; again, the rock, struck by Moses' rod, was split, so that rivers ran in the dry places. Until that Rock, Which was Christ, was stricken, and <sup>10</sup>out of His Side came Blood and water, the whole world was desert and barren; then it was turned into streams of water, and <sup>11</sup>now not four but twelve streams went forth from the Paradise of Scriptures. For from the One Fountain which is Christ, there issue many streams, even as many as convey the waters of His teaching, to water the earth.

10 The mountains saw Thee, and they trembled, lit. they tremble. While man is insensate, inanimate nature feels and attests the presence of its Maker. It saw, it trembles. To see, feel, tremble, were one. The Prophet does not follow a bare order of events, or bind himself to miracles which actually took place. The mountains tremble with earthquakes, or seem to be shaken by the thunders which they re-echo. And so they are signs, how what is firmest and closes up the way to man, trembles at the Presence of God. Whatever is lifted up shall be bowed down before Him<sup>12</sup>. But the word trembled, is that used especially of travail pangs<sup>13</sup>, and so it may spiritually denote that <sup>14</sup>they who conceive the fear of God shall bring forth unto salvation. The overflowing i. e., the impetuous, sweeping, flow, of the water<sup>15</sup> (or of waters), such as in themselves would bear all before them, pass by harmless. The more they swell, the more they expend themselves, and pass away. "The whole force of persecution, wherewith they vexed Thy people, at sight of Thee passed away," like a torrent which rages and disappears, and, by raging, the sooner wastes itself.

<sup>14</sup> Theoph. <sup>15</sup> וַיִּשָּׁק is used apparently both of the "flow of waters and their strong current," as Tanch. explains it here; or of a violent storm breaking upon a thing. Its union with rain, Is. iv. 6, hail, Is. xxviii. 2. xxx. 80, the mountains, Job xxiv. 8, fits in with or requires the meaning "storm;" its union with mighty overflowing (עֲבֹרָה) waters Is. xxviii. implies "a current;" "a storm against a wall" וַיִּשָּׁק, Is. xxv. 4, might suit either; the verb וַיִּשָּׁק, "hast swept them away," Ps. xc. 5, implies "a flood;" the mention of the clouds Ps. lxxvii. 18, "a storm." Kim. Raahi, Abarb. explain it here of water on the earth; A. E. of waters descending.

The deep uttered his voice, and lifted up his hands <sup>1</sup> on high. The noise of the waves, when God brought the strong East wind over it and <sup>2</sup> rebuked it, was as a cry to God; the waves, as they swelled, were like hands lifted up to Him, and stricken one against the other. There is no distinct ground against a slightly different rendering, <sup>3</sup> the deep uttered his voice, the height lifted up his hands i. e., to One yet higher, Whom height and depth owned as their Lord and worshipped.

11 Sun and moon stood still in [as one act <sup>4</sup>, retiring into] their habitation. They withdrew, as it were, in the midst of the great tempest, wherein <sup>5</sup> God cast down great stones from heaven upon His enemies and they died; and the sun stood still, and the moon stayed. The sun too withdrew itself in the great darkness at the Crucifixion, as not bearing to look upon the Death of its Maker, when the majesty of the Sun of Righteousness was darkened o'er; and signs in the sun and in the moon there shall be to the end.

At the light of Thine arrows they went. "There was no need of the sun by day, nor of the moon by night; for by the light of Thine arrows can the sons of men hold their way." "This is a mystical interpretation, as you see; this is like the promise of the Most High; <sup>6</sup> the sun shall be no more for thy light by day, neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee, and the Lord shall be to thee an everlasting light." The judgements of God are a light to His people, while they are the destruction of His enemies; in them they <sup>7</sup> learn righteousness. The arrows are God's judgements, as they threaten and wound from afar; the shining of Thy glittering [lit. of the lightning of Thy] spear, when close at hand. When all other light is withdrawn, and the Sun, our Lord, is hardly beheld in the darkness of the last days, and the moon, the Church, shall not give her light, Christ not shining upon her as before, because iniquity shall abound, and the love of many shall wax cold, and sturs, many who seem to shine with the light of grace, shall fall from heaven, His own shall walk on and advance in holiness, "from strength to strength <sup>11</sup>, from good to better, from the way to their home," by the bright light of the lightning of God's Judgements, wherein His glory <sup>12</sup> shall be manifested. Arrows and spears are part of the spiritual armoury of God, wherewith the people are subdued unto Him; "armoury, not wherewith He is girt but which He giveth to those who are meet; bright and as it were full of lightning. For most transparent is virtue." They went then at the light of Thine arrows; "because to those who love sin virtue has no beauty, nor, as yet, any brightness. But to those who know her she is nothing less than lightning, bright and transparent, so that whoso hath her is easily known to all around. The disciples then, first having the lightning of Thine arms, shall lead others also to its Light. Admiring and conceiving in themselves those virtues which are the arms of Christ, they shine forth to others, a gleam, as it were, of the bright flash of light inherent in those graces." "They were enlightened and began, by preaching, to send forth shining words of truth. But those words are Thine arrows, shining arrows, shewing by their light the way of life, and by their sharp point pricking the hearts of people unto repentance."

12 Thou didst tread the earth in indignation. The word tread <sup>15</sup> is used of very solemn manifestations of God <sup>16</sup>, of His going to give to His own victory over their enemies <sup>17</sup>. Not the land only, as of old, but the earth is the scene of His judgements; the earth which was full of His praise, which He meted out <sup>18</sup>, which contained the nations whom He chastened, the whole earth. Thou dost thresh the heathen in anger. Not then only, but at all times unto the end, distress of nations and perplexity are among the shoots of the fig-tree, which betoken that the everlasting <sup>19</sup> summer is nigh at hand. Jerusalem, when it had slain the Prince of Life, was given over to desolation and counted like the heathen. It became the synagogue, not the Church; and so in the destruction of Jerusalem (as it is an image of the destruction of the world) was that again fulfilled, Thou dost march through the earth in indignation, Thou dost thresh the heathen in anger.

13 Thou wentest forth. Even a Jew says of this place, "The past is here used for the future; and this is frequent in the language of prophecy; for prophecy, although it be future, yet since it is, as it were, firmly fixed, they use the past concerning it." The Prophet speaks again in the past, perhaps to fix the mind on that signal going-forth, when God destroyed Pharaoh, the first enemy who essayed to destroy the chosen line. This stands at the head of all those dispensations, in which God put or shall put forth His might to save His people or destroy their enemies. All is with Him one everlasting purpose; the last were, as it were, embodied in the first: were it not for the last, the first would not have been. Prophecy, in speaking of the first, has in mind all the rest, and chiefly the chiefest and the end of all, the full salvation of His people through Jesus Christ our Lord. Thou wentest forth <sup>21</sup>, i. e., "Thou, the Unseen God, gavest signs which may be seen of Thy Presence or coming to men." Thou wentest forth, not by change of place, for Thou art not bounded; Thou art without change; but by shewing Thy power, and doing something anew openly for the salvation of Thy people, even for salvation with <sup>22</sup> Thine

So also the Vulgate and other old Jewish authorities. Rachmon (in Martini Pug. Fid. f. 534.) notes "that the word eth means with, as in Gen. xxxvii. 2. xxxix. 2." For although it might be used to mark the object only after a verbal noun, it is not likely that the construction would have been changed, unless the meaning were dif-

Anointed. God, from the first, helped His people through single persons, Moses, Joshua, each of the Judges, accustoming them to receive deliverance by one, and to gather together all their hopes in One. To Moses He said, <sup>1</sup> I will be with thee, and to Joshua, <sup>2</sup> As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee, and to Cyrus, <sup>3</sup> I will go before thee, preparing His people to receive that nearer Presence with His Christ, of which our Lord says: <sup>4</sup> Believest thou not, that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me? The Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works. <sup>5</sup> "The Son of God, God Invisible, became Man, visible; and with Him, so going forth, the Holy Spirit went forth to the salvation of His people, so as to give a visible sign of His Coming. For upon His Christ Himself, Him Who was anointed with the Holy Ghost <sup>6</sup>, He descended in a bodily Shape, as a Dove. So He went forth to the Salvation of His people, i. e., to save His people with His Christ, our Saviour;" and again, on the Day of Pentecost, when that other Comforter came, Whom, He said, I will send unto you from the Father, and in Whose Presence His own promise was fulfilled, Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. His Presence was manifested both in the remission of sins, and the parting of graces among all, and in the <sup>7</sup> signs and wonders, and divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, wherewith God bare witness to the Apostles, when <sup>8</sup> they went forth, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following. A going forth to judgement, at the end of the world, is foretold in the like image of warfare <sup>9</sup>.

Thou woundedst [crushedst] the head out of the house of the wicked. One wicked stands over against One anointed, as in Isaiah, <sup>10</sup> He shall smite the earth with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips shall He slay the wicked; and David speaks of one, <sup>11</sup> He shall smite the head over a great land; and S. Paul speaks of <sup>12</sup> that Wicked, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His Coming. Him He shall destroy at once from above and below; overthrowing his kingdom from the foundation. From above, his head was crushed in pieces; from below, the house was razed from its very foundations. So Amos said, <sup>13</sup> The Lord said, Smite the capital, and the lintel [threshold] strike, and wound them in the head, all of them; and with a different image, <sup>14</sup> I destroyed his fruit from above, and his roots from beneath. First, the head is struck off, crushed; then the house from the foundations to its neck; then as it were the headless walls. The image of the neck may be the rather used to recall, that ferent. Had eth been only the sign of the object, there was no occasion for inserting it at all, and it would probably have been avoided, as only making the sentence ambiguous, in that it may more obviously be taken in the sense adopted by Aq. and the Vulgate and the E. V. The LXX and two early heretics who disbelieved the Divinity of our Lord (Theodot. and Nymn) render "to save Thy Christ." The LXX is wrong moreover, in that the Anointed is never used of the people, but of single persons only, who were shadows of the Christ. "Thine anointed" is understood of one individual, "the king of Judah," by A. E. "Saul and David," by Rashi; "Moses" by Abarb.; "Hesekiah" by Tanch.; but "Messiah Ben David" by Kim. Sal. b. Mel.

as the house of God is built of living stones, so the kingdom of the evil-one is made of living dead, who shall never cease to exist in an undying death. The bruising of Satan, the head or prince of this evil world, is the deliverance of the world. His head was bruised, when, by the Death of our Lord, the Prince of this world was cast out; he is crushed out of the house of the wicked, whenever he, the strong man, is bound and cast out, and "the soul of the sinner which had been his abode, becomes the house of God, and righteousness dwelleth there and walketh in her."

"<sup>5</sup> Thou didst not leave any error or vice in the world unshaken, either what was concealed, like the foundation of a house; or that which was open, as the neck of the body is open;" to the neck, where the destruction from above ceased, so that nothing remained unsmitten. "<sup>6</sup> For they being, by the fiery tongues which Thou shewedst without, made fervent and strong, wise and eloquent, ceased not, until they made known to all, what folly was this world's wisdom, what sacrilege its sacred worship." "<sup>10</sup> His secret counsels He laid bare, as the Apostle says, <sup>17</sup> We are not ignorant of his devices; and, to another is given the discerning of spirits."

14 Thou didst strike through with his staves the head of his villages <sup>18</sup>. The destruction comes not upon himself only, but upon the whole multitude of his subjects; and this not by any mere act of Divine might, but with his own staves, turning upon him the destruction which he prepared for others. So it often was of old. When the Midianites and Amalekites and the children of the east <sup>19</sup> wasted Israel in the days of Gideon, <sup>20</sup> the Lord set every man's sword against his fellow, even throughout all the host; and when God delivered the Philistines into the hand of Jonathan <sup>21</sup>; so was it with Ammon Moab and the inhabitants of Mount Seir, at the prayer of Jehoshaphat and his army <sup>22</sup>. And so it shall be, God says, at the end, of the army of Gog; every man's sword shall be against his brother <sup>23</sup>, and Isaiah says, <sup>24</sup> every man shall eat the flesh of his own arm, and Zechariah, <sup>25</sup> a great tumult from the Lord shall be among them; and they shall lay every man hold on the hand of his neighbour, and his hand shall rise up against the hand of his neighbour. So Pharaoh drove Israel to the shore of the sea, in which he himself perished; Daniel's accusers perished in the den of lions, from which Daniel was delivered unharmed <sup>26</sup>; and so Haman was hanged on the gallows which he prepared for Mordecai <sup>27</sup>. So it became a saying of Psalmists, <sup>28</sup> He made a pit and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch which he themselves. As in Ezek. xxxviii. 11, where "a land of מִצְרַיִם" is expanded into "where they all dwell without wall; and bar and double gates they have not;" and Deut. iii. 5, "all these were fenced cities, with high wall, double gates and bar, besides cities of מִצְרַיִם," and 1 Sam. vi. 18, "from the fenced city to the village of מִצְרַיִם," and Zech. ii. 8, "Jerusalem shall dwell as מִצְרַיִם for the multitude of men and cattle therein; and I, saith the Lord, will be a wall of fire around." In Esther ix. 19, cities מִצְרַיִם are contrasted with Shushan v. 18, and "the Perizzite," very possibly, was originally "paganus" "one who dwelt in villages." This rendering is adopted by chief Jewish interpreters; Kim. "cities of the plain, which have no fort nor wall." So Abulw. Tanch. "land;" Rashi, Abarb. "his cities and villages;" A. E. keeps the word, but implies the meaning, on Zech. ii. 8. Kim. Sal. b. Mel. obtained the sense of "forces" here, that they "shall come in great numbers, and so dwell in Jerusalem, as מִצְרַיִם, who dwell in מִצְרַיִם, who spread in the whole place, who have no wall to enclose them." This explains Jon. "the forces of Pharaoh," as hordes too large to be enclosed in walls, and perhaps the LXX. Συδάρται. <sup>19</sup> Jud. vi. 3. 4. <sup>20</sup> Ib. vii. 22. <sup>21</sup> 1 Sam. xiv. 12, 16, 20. <sup>22</sup> 2 Chron. xx. 22, 23. <sup>23</sup> Ezek. xxxviii. 21. <sup>24</sup> Is. ix. 20. <sup>25</sup> Zech. xiv. 18. <sup>26</sup> Dan. vi. 24. <sup>27</sup> Esth. vii. 10. <sup>28</sup> Ps. vii. 5. add ix. 15, x. 2, xxxv. 8, lvii. 6, xciv. 23. cxli. 10. mude; his mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate: and this from above, sent down by God. The heathen too observed that there was "no juster law than that artificers of death by their own art should perish." This too befell him, when he seemed to have all but gained his end. They came [out] as a whirlwind to scatter me, with whirlwind force, to drive them asunder to all the quarters of the heavens, as the wind scatters the particles of <sup>1</sup> cloud, or <sup>2</sup> as the stubble which passeth away by the wind of the wilderness. Pharaoh at the Red Sea or Sennacherib, sweep all before them. Pharaoh said, <sup>3</sup> I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil; my lust shall be satisfied upon them; I will draw my sword, my hand shall destroy them.

Their rejoicing. It is no longer one enemy. The malice of the members was concentrated in the head; the hatred concentrated in him was diffused in them. The readiness of instruments of evil to fulfil evil is an incentive to those who conceive it; those who seem to ride the wave are but carried on upon the crest of the surge which they first roused. They cannot check themselves or it. So the ambitious conceiver of mischief has his own guilt; the willing instruments of evil have theirs. Neither could be fully evil without the other. Sennacherib had been nothing without those fierce warriors who are pictured on the monuments, with individual fierceness fulfilling his will, nor the Huns without Attila, or Attila without his hordes whose tempers he embodied. Satan would be powerless but for the willing instruments whom he uses. So then Holy Scripture sometimes passes from the mention of the evil multitude to that of the one head, on earth or in hell, who impels them; or from the one evil head who has his own special responsibility in originating it, to the evil multitude, whose responsibility and guilt lies in fomenting the evil which they execute.

Their rejoicing. He does not say simply "they rejoice to," but herein is their exceeding, exulting joy. The wise of this earth glories in his wisdom, the mighty man in his might, the rich in his riches: the truly wise, that he understandeth and knoweth God. But as for these, their exultation is concentrated in this,—savagery; in this is their jubilation; this is their passion. Psalmists and pious men use the word to express their exulting joy in God: men must have an object for their empassioned souls; and these, in cruelty.

As it were to devour the poor secretly. From the general he descends again to the individual, but so as now to set forth the guilt of each individual in that stormy multitude which is, as it were, one in its evil unity, when each merges his responsibility, as it were, in that of the body, the horde or the mob, in which he acts. Their exultation, he says, is that of the individual robber and murderer, who lies wait secretly in his ambush, to spring on the defenceless wanderer, to slay him and devour his substance. Premeditation, passion, lust of cruelty, cowardice, murderousness, habitual individual savagery and treachery, and that to the innocent and defenceless, are all concentrated in the words, their exultation

Pharaoh had triumphed over Israel. <sup>4</sup> They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in. He rejoiced in having them wholly in his power, as a lion has his prey in his lair, in secret, unknown to the Eyes of God Whom he regarded not, with none to behold, none to deliver. <sup>5</sup> They gloried in oppressing the people of Israel, even as the cruel man glories in secretly rending and afflicting the needy, when without fear they do this cruelty, nor heed God be-holding all as Judge. The invisible enemies too rejoice very greatly in the ruin of our souls. <sup>6</sup> Lest mine enemy say, I have prevailed against him: for if I be cast down, they that trouble me will rejoice at it. <sup>7</sup> O Lord and governor of all my life, leave me not to their counsels and let me not fall by them. Yet God left them not in his hands; but even brake the head of Leviathan in pieces.

15 Thou didst walk through the sea with Thine horses. God Himself is pictured as leading them on the way, Himself at the head of their multitude, having, as Asaph said of old, <sup>8</sup> His path in the sea. So Isaiah, <sup>9</sup> Who leddest them in the depths; and Zechariah, <sup>10</sup> And he shall pass through the sea. God was literally there; for <sup>11</sup> in Him we live and move and have our being. He Who "is wholly everywhere but the whole of Him nowhere" manifested His Presence there. Such anthropomorphisms have a truth, which men's favourite abstractions have not.

Through the heap <sup>12</sup> of great waters, as of old, <sup>13</sup> the waters stood as a heap, and He made the waters to stand as a heap. The very hindrances to deliverance are in God's Hands a way for His ends. The waves of the Red sea rose in heaps, yet this was but a readier way for the salvation of His people and the destruction of their enemies. <sup>14</sup> God prepareth ever a way for His elect in this present evil world, and leadeth them along the narrow way which leadeth unto life.

16 When I heard, better, I heard and &c. The prophet sums up, resuming that same declaration with which he had begun, I heard, I was afraid. Only now he expresses far more strongly both his awe at God's judgements and his hopes. He had just beheld the image of the destruction of Pharaoh, the end of the brief triumphing of the wicked and of the trials of God's people. But awful as are all the judgements of God upon the enemies of His people, it was not this alone which was the object of his terror. This was deliverance. It was the whole course of God's dispensations, which he had heard; God's punishment of His people for their sins, and the excision of their oppressors, who, in His Providence, fulfilling their own evil end, executed His chastisements upon them. The deliverances, which shadowed out the future, had their dark side, in that they were deliverances. The whole course of this world is one series of man's unfaithfulnesses or sins, God's chastisements of them through their fellow-sinners, and His ultimate overthrow of the aggressors. Those first three centuries of glorious martyrdoms were, on the one side, the malice and hatred of Satan and the world against the truth; on the other side, the prophets of those days told their people that they were the chastisements of their sins. Future deliverance implies previous chastisement of those delivered. The prophet then, at the close, in view of all, for himself and all whose perplexities he represented and pleaded before God, chooses his and their portion. "Suffer here and rest for ever!" "Endure here any terror, any failure of hopes, yet trust wholly in God, have rest in the day of trouble and sing the endless song!" Again he casts himself back amid all the troubles of this life.

I heard [i. e. that speech of God uttering judgements to come] and my belly<sup>1</sup>, the whole inward self, bodily and mental, all his hidden powers, trembled<sup>2</sup>, "vibrated" as it were, "in every fibre of his frame," at the wrath of God; my lips quivered<sup>3</sup> at the voice of God, so that they almost refused their office and could hardly fulfil the prophetic duty and utter the terrors which he had heard; his very strongest parts, the bones, which keep the whole frame of man together, that he be not a shapeless mass, and which remain unconsumed long after the rest has wasted away in the grave, rottenness entered into them, corruption and mouldering eating into them<sup>4</sup>; and I trembled in myself [lit. under me<sup>5</sup>] so that he was a burden to himself and sank unable to support himself, that I might rest in the day of trouble. All up to this time was weariness and terror, and now at once all is repose; the prophet is carried, as it were, over the troubles of this life and the decay of the grave to the sweetness of everlasting rest<sup>7</sup>. I, the same, suffer these things, terror, quivering, rottenness in the very bones themselves. I [lit.] who shall rest<sup>8</sup> in the day of trouble. I who had not rest until then, shall enter into rest then in the very day of trouble to all who found their rest in the world not in God, the day of judgement. <sup>9</sup> Blessed is the man whom Thou chastenest, O Lord, and teachest him in Thy law, that Thou mayest give him patience in time of adversity, until the pit be digged up for the ungodly.

"O my soul; had we daily to bear tortures, had we for a long time to endure hell itself, that we might see Christ in His glory and be the companion of His Saints, were it not worth enduring all sorrow, that we might be partakers of so exceeding a good, such exceeding glory?"

When he cometh up unto the people, he shall invade them with his troops, or, which is probably meant, when he cometh up who shall invade them<sup>11</sup>. It is a filling out of the day of trouble<sup>12</sup>. However near the trouble came, he, under the protection of God and in firm trust in Him, would be at rest in Him. The troubles of God's prophets are not the outward troubles, but the sins of their people which bring those troubles, the offence against the majesty of God, the loss of souls. Jeremiah was more at rest in the court of the prison, than when all the people did curse him<sup>13</sup> for telling them God's Truth. He who fears God and His judgements betimes, shall rest in perfect tranquillity when those judgements come. The immediate trouble was the fierce assault of the Chaldees whose terror he had described; and this, picturing, as through the prophecy, all other judgements of God even to the last, when devils shall contend about the souls of men, as Satan did about the body of Moses.

17 Although [lit. For<sup>14</sup>] the figtree shall not blossom. The Prophet repeats his confidence in God, premising his knowledge that all human hopes should fail. I know, he says, all stay and support shall fail; he numbers from the least to the greatest, the fruits of trees, the fig, vine and olive, for sweetness, gladness, cheerfulness<sup>15</sup>, whereof the well-being of the vine and figtree furnishes the proverbial picture of peace and rest. These shall either not shoot forth, or shall at time of fruit-gathering have no produce<sup>16</sup>, or having, as it were, laboured to bring forth fruit shall lie<sup>17</sup>, and fail: yet further "the staff of life" itself shall fail; the fields shall yield no meat; all the fields, as though they were but one<sup>18</sup>, shall fluos, and עָרַץ would be more natural than עָרַץ. But the prophet would not needlessly make his language ambiguous. Had he meant, "in the coming up of a or the people," he would have used the common עָרַץ or עָרַץ. The construction of עָרַץ with ל instead of עַל, "to" for "against," is exceptional. But עָרַץ occurs with the equivalent מֵל of the person, and in one case with ל (as we say "go up to") Gen. xlv. 24, 34. xlv. 9. Ex. xix. 3, 24. xxiii. 1, 12. xxxii. 30. Deut. x. 1. Josh. x. 4, 6. Jer. xlv. 28, 31. עָרַץ also, is used without the art. (as a sort of proper name) of the Jewish people, Is. xxvi. 11. xlv. 6. נִדָּר occurs Gen. xli. 19. there also with acc.; נִדָּר, our, "troop" (verb) Jer. x. 7. See also Mic. iv. 14. p. 338. <sup>13</sup> עָרַץ is a general term which occurs also Is. xxxvii. 3, more commonly with ב, בְּיָמֵי עָרַץ, Ps. xx. 2, 1. 15, Pr. xxiv. 10, xxv. 19, Jer. xvi. 19, Ob. 12, 14, Nah. i. 7. There is no ground then to limit it to the Chaldean or Assyrian period. <sup>14</sup> Jer. xv. 10. <sup>15</sup> The adverbial or exceptional force attributed to עָרַץ, always lies in the relation of the two sentences, not in the עָרַץ itself, which is always causative, "for" or "because." <sup>16</sup> Ps. civ. 15. <sup>17</sup> עָרַץ occurs here only of the produce of trees; 10 times of the earth itself directly; in Ps. lxxvii. 1, its produce, as the result of human culture, is עָרַץ, יִצְחָק, and Job xx. 28 יִצְחָק עָרַץ occurs here only of the fruit, being an application of the common idiom עָרַץ עָרַץ. <sup>18</sup> עָרַץ as Hos. ix. 2. <sup>19</sup> עָרַץ, (an old word Deut. xxxii. 32) with no known etymology, is used, in three out of the four places in which it certainly occurs, in relation to place: "fields of Gomorrah" Deut. i. c. "f. of Kidron" 2 Kgs. xxiii. 4. "f. of Hebron" Is. xvi. 8. It occurs in a fifth, (if, as is probable, the Kri is right), "all the fields unto the brook Kidron" i. e. reaching to it, Jer. xxxi. 40. As a collective, it is joined with a sing. verb here, and Is. xvi. 8.

<sup>1</sup> בֶּטֶן is used of the inward part of man, which "prepareth mischief," Job xv. 35; the spirit whereof constrains one, Ib. xxxii. 18; the chambers of which are searched out by the spirit of man, as the lamp of God, Prov. xx. 27; as cleansed by stripes Ib. 30; where the words of the wise are guarded, Ib. xxii. 18; which should not be filled with the East wind, Job xv. 2. In the like way in the N. T. "from his belly, κοιλία, shall flow living waters," S. John vii. 38. In Arab. بطن is the "inner meaning;" بطن "he knew the inner, the intrinsic, state of the case;" with بطن, "became intimate with;" conj. x. with acc., "penetrated a thing." So also بطن "that which is within," of facts, thoughts, mind. See Lane. All are derivative senses. بطن has nothing in common with Ar. بطن, as Gen.

<sup>2</sup> "ragaz," twice repeated in this verse, takes up, as it were, "rogez" wrath v. 2. <sup>3</sup> Del. <sup>4</sup> עָרַץ occurs of the tingling of the ear, 1 Sam. iii. 11. 2 Kgs. xxi. 12. Jer. xiii. 8. "From the fear at the meaning of this sound which he has heard his lips trembled in speaking, and he uttered their words with a trembling sound." Tanch. <sup>5</sup> אָרַץ (the root) is used of the decay of wood and of the bones, and Pr. x. 7, of "the name of the wicked." <sup>6</sup> As 2 Sam. ii. 28. "he died" as we say, "on the spot," sinking down dead. <sup>7</sup> The very softness of the original word עָרַץ stands in contrast with the rigidity in the words tirgaz, rakab, regaz, tsarah. <sup>8</sup> עָרַץ is uniformly "rest." It is used of rest from labour, from calamities, [Is. xxiv. 7 Job iii. 26.] rest in a place, with ב, or on (עַל) it; of the Holy Spirit resting on a person (with עַל). But its meaning is uniformly of rest, not of silence as to a thing [as Gen.] nor does עָרַץ furnish any analogy, since this in itself signifies "kept silence." Nor can it mean "wait patiently for," for מָרַץ "rest" is the very opposite of "waiting for," מָרַץ, which necessarily involves a degree, even if of subdued unrest. Then, תָּרַץ, נָרַץ, עָרַץ, are used of waiting, looking for good, not for evil.

have one common lot, barrenness. Yet more; the flocks shall be cut off<sup>1</sup> from the fold; not those only, feeding abroad in fields and open plains, shall be driven away, but they shall be carried away by the enemy from the folds, where they seemed penned securely; and not these only, but there shall be no herd in the stalls<sup>2</sup>, even the stronger animals shall utterly fail; every help for labour, or for clothing, or for food shall cease; he speaks not of privation, partial failure, but of the entire loss of all things, no meat from the fields, no herd in the stalls; and what then? And I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation. The words are very impressive, as they stand in the Hebrew. "For," he says, "the fig-tree shall not blossom, and there is no fruit in the vines, the labour of the olive hath failed;" (the Prophet does not look on, only to these things, but in his mind stands in the midst of them<sup>3</sup>, they are done, and he amid them, feeling their effects) "and the field hath yielded no food; the flock hath been cut off from the fold, and there is no herd in the stall; and I"—He relates it as the result of all which had gone before; such and such was the state of fruit-trees, vintage, harvest, flocks and herds; such was the aspect of all nature, living or inanimate; all was barren, disappointing; all had failed and was gone; and then at last he comes to himself, and I; what is he doing, when all nature and every seeming hope is dead? thus and thus it is with them; and I—will rejoice. He almost uses the expression as to the exultation of the enemy, adopting the same word only in a softer form. "Their exulting joy was" concentrated in this, "as to devour the poor secretly;" he too had "exulting joy." There is a joy against joy: a joy of theirs in the possession of all which their rapacity covets, in the possession of all things: a joy of his amid the privation of all things. He contrasts the two joys, as David had of old; the men of the world, whose portion is in this life, whose belly Thou fillest with Thy hid treasure; they are sated of children and leave their substance to their babes: I, he adds, I shall behold Thy Presence in righteousness, I shall be sated, in the awakening, with Thine image. So Habakkuk, I will not rejoice only, but shout for joy<sup>4</sup>; and not so only, but I will bound for joy; and this not for a time only; both words express a drawing, yearning<sup>5</sup> of the soul, and this yet more and more, I will shout for joy and would shout on; I will bound for joy and would bound on. But whence the source of this measureless unutterable joy? In the Lord, the Unchangeable God, Who is and was and is to come, I AM, (it is the incommunicable Name); in the God of my salvation: it is almost the Name of Jesus<sup>7</sup>; for JESUS is salvation, and the Name means "the Lord is Salvation;" whence

In Buxtorf's instance, נִקְרָא נִקְרָא "found it in a stall," the word is very probably used in the sense ascribed to it here by tradition as "well known in the language of the ancient (doctors) who say in the sing. נִקְרָא נִקְרָא. the words are here rendered even by a Jew<sup>8</sup>, "in God the Author of my redemption," and yet more sweetly by a father<sup>9</sup>, "in God my Jesus." In Him his joy begins, to Him and in Him it flows back and on; before he ventures, amid all the desolation, to speak of joy, he names the Name of God, and, as it were, stays himself in God, is enveloped and wrapped round in God; and I (the words stand in this order) and I in the Lord would shout for joy. He comes, as it were, and places himself quite close to God, so that nothing, not even his joy should be between himself and God; "and I in the Lord." All creation, as it had failed, ceases to be; all out of God: he speaks of nothing but himself and God, or rather himself in God; and as He, God, comes before his joy, as its source, so in Him does he lose himself, with joy which cannot be contained, nor expressed, nor rest, but utters itself in the glad motions of untiring love. I would bound for joy in my Saving God. Truly all our joy is, to be in Him in Whom is all Good, Who is all Goodness and all Love.

The LORD God is my strength. The prophet does not inwardly only exult and triumph in God, but he confesses also in words of praise, that in Him he hath all things, that He is All things in him. And as he had confessed the Father, under the Name whereby He revealed Himself to Moses, and the Son, "the Lord God of my salvation," so he confesses<sup>10</sup> God the Holy Ghost, Who, in us, is our strength. He is our strength, so that through Him, we can do all things; He is our strength, so that without Him, we can do nothing; He is our strength, so that when we put forth strength, we put forth nothing of our own, we add nothing of our own, we use not our own strength, of which we have none, but we do use His; and we have It ever ready to use, as if it were our own. For it is not our own and it is our own; not our own, i. e., not from or of ourselves; but our own, since It is in us, yea He the Lord our God is our strength, not without us, for He is our strength, but in us. And so he says further, how we can use it as our own. He will make my feet like hinds, which bound upward through His imparted strength, and, when scared by alarms here below, flee fearless to their native rocks, spring from height to height, and at last shew themselves on some high peak, and standing on the Rock, look down on the whole world below their feet and upward on high. Even so, <sup>11</sup>when at the end of the world all shall fail, and the love of many shall wax cold, and the Church, which is likened to the fig tree the vine and the <sup>12</sup>olive, shall yield no fruits, and sweetness shall be corrupted by vanities, and the oil of mercy shall be dried up, and lamps go out, and its promises shall fail and it shall lie, having a show of goodness, but denying the power of it; in words confessing God, and in works denying Him; and through their own negligences, or the carelessness of pastors, the sheep of Christ shall perish from His very fold, and they who should be strong to labour<sup>1</sup> shall cease, God's elect shall joy in Him, "beholding His goodness, and loving Him in all things, and He will give them free affections, and fervid longings of holy love, whereby they shall not walk only, but run the way of His commandments and prevail over the enemies of their salvation."

Yet though this strength is inward, and used by man, still God Who gives it, Himself guides it. Not man shall direct his own ways, but He will make me to walk (as on a plain way) upon my high places. Steep and slippery places and crags of the rocks are but ways to the safe height above, to those whom God makes to walk on them; and since he has passed all things earthly, what are his high places, but the heavenly places, even his home, even while a pilgrim here, but now at the end, much more his home, when not in hope only, but in truth, he is raised up together, and made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus<sup>2</sup>?

And now what remains then, but that this song of praise should be for ever? And so it is not without meaning, nor was of old thought to be so<sup>3</sup>, that there stand here, at the end, words which elsewhere in the Psalms always stand at the beginning. Nor is it any where else, "upon my stringed instruments." To the chief singer on my stringed instruments. To Him to Whom all praise is due, through Whom we praise Himself, His Spirit pleading in us, for us, upon my stringed instruments. He Himself, providing, as it were, and teaching the prelude of the endless song, and by His Spirit, breathing upon the instrument which He has attuned, and it giving back faithfully, in union with the heavenly Choir with whom it is now blended, the Angelic Hymn, "Glory to God in the Highest."

ZEPHANIAH.

ZEPHANIAH was called to his office, at all events not long after Habakkuk. As his time was near to that of Habakkuk, so his subject also was kindred. Both lived when, for the sins of the reign of Manasseh, God had pronounced upon Jerusalem an irreversible sentence of destruction. The mission of both was not to the whole people whose sentence was fixed, but to the individuals who would flee from the wrath to come. The form of Habakkuk's prophecy was (as we might say) more subjective; that of Zephaniah, more objective. Habakkuk exhibits the victory of faith in the oppressed faithful; how it would hold to God amid the domestic oppressions, amid the oppressions of the Chaldees by whom those oppressions were to be punished, and, when all shall seem to fail, should, in the certainty of its unseen life, joy in its God. The characteristic of Zephaniah is the declaration of the tenderness of the love of God for that remnant of Israel, the afflicted and poor people, whom God would leave in the midst of them.

Zephaniah has, like Habakkuk, to declare the judgement on the world. He renews the language of Joel as to "the day of the Lord," and points it to nations and individuals. He opens with the prophecy of one wide destruction of the land and all the sinners in it, its idolaters and its oppressors, its princes, its royal family, its merchants, its petty plunderers, who used rapine under colour of their masters' name, and brought guilt on themselves and them. Nothing is either too high or too low to escape the judgements of God. But the visitation on Judah was part only of a more comprehensive judgement. Zephaniah foretells the wider destruction of enemies of God's people on all sides: of Philistia, Moab, Ammon, on each side of them, and the distant nations on either side, Ethiopia (which then included Egypt) and Assyria. All these particular judgements contain principles of God's judgements at all times. But in Zephaniah they seem all to converge in the love of God for the remnant of His people. The nation he calls a nation not desired. Individuals he calls to God; it may be, ye shall be hid in the Day of the Lord's anger. He foretells a sifting time, wherein God would take away the proud among her<sup>a</sup>; yet there follows a largeness of Gospel promise and of love<sup>b</sup>, the grounds of which are explained in the Gospel, but whose tenderness of language is hardly surpassed even by the overwhelming tenderness of the love of Christ which passeth knowledge.

The prophet's own name "the Lord hath hid" corresponds with this. The Psalmist had said, using this same word, "He shall hide me in His tabernacle in the day of evil: in the secret of His tabernacle He shall hide me;" and, "O how great is Thy goodness, which Thou hast laid up<sup>b</sup> for them that fear Thee. Thou shalt hide them in the secret of Thy presence from the pride of man. Thou shalt keep them secretly<sup>i</sup> in a pavilion from the strife of tongues." "They take counsel against Thy hidden ones."

The date which Zephaniah prefixed to his prophecy, has not been disputed; for no one felt any interest in denying it. Those who disbelieve definite prophecy invented for themselves a solution, whereby they thought that Zephaniah's prophecy need not be definite, even though uttered in the time of Josiah; so the fact remained unquestioned.

The unwonted fulness with which his descent is given implies so much of that personal knowledge which soon fades away, that those who speak of other titles, as having been prefixed to the books, or portions of books of the prophets, by later hands, have not questioned this. The only question is, whether he lived before or in the middle of the reformation by Josiah. Josiah, who came to the throne when eight years old B. C. 641, began the reformation in the twelfth year of his reign<sup>i</sup>, when almost twenty; B. C. 630. The extirpation of idolatry could not, it appears, be accomplished at once. The finding of the ancient copy of the law, during the repairs of the temple in the eighteenth year of his reign<sup>m</sup>, B. C. 624, gave a fresh impulse to the king's efforts. He then united the people with himself, bound all the people present to the covenant<sup>n</sup> to keep the law, and made a further destruction of idols<sup>o</sup> before the solemn passover in that year. Even after that passover some abominations had to be removed<sup>p</sup>. It has been thought that the words, I will cut off the remnant of Baal from this place, imply that the worship of Baal had already in some degree been removed, and that God said, that He would complete what had been begun. But the emphasis seems to be rather on the completeness of the destruction, as we should say, that He would efface every remnant of Baal, than to refer to any effort which had been made by human authority to destroy it.

The prophet joins together, I will cut off the remnant of Baal, the name of the Chemarim. The cutting off the name of the Chemarim, or idolatrous priests, is like that of Hosea<sup>r</sup>, I will take away the names of Baalim out of her mouth, and they shall no more be remembered by their name. As the cutting off of the name of the Chemarim means their being utterly obliterated, so, probably, does the cutting off the remnant of Baal. The worship of Baal was cut off, not through Josiah, but (as Zephaniah prophesied) through the captivity. Jeremiah asserts its continuance during his long prophetic office<sup>a</sup>.

In the absence of any direct authority to the contrary, the description of idolatry by Zephaniah would seem to belong to the period, before the measures to abolish it were begun. He speaks as if everything were full of idolatry<sup>b</sup>, the worship of Baal, the worship of the host of heaven upon the housetops, swearing by Malcham, and probably the clothing with strange apparel.

The state also was as corrupt<sup>c</sup> as the worship. Princes and judges, priests and prophets were all alike in sin; the judges distorted the law between man and man, as the priests profaned all which related to God. The princes were roaring lions; the judges, evening wolves, ever famished, hungering for new prey. This too would scarcely have been, when Josiah was old enough to govern in his own person. Both idolatry and perversion of justice were continued on from the reign of his father Amon. Both, when old enough, he removed. God Himself gives him the praise, that he did judgement and justice, then it was well with him; he judged the cause of the poor and needy, then it was well with him; was not this to know Me? saith the Lord. His conversion was in the eighth year of his reign. Then, while he was yet young, he began to seek after the God of David his father.

The mention of the king's children<sup>d</sup>, whom, God says, He would punish in the great day of His visitation, does not involve any later date. They might, any how have been brothers or uncles of the king Josiah. But, more probably, God declares that no rank should be exempt from the judgements of that day. He knew too that the sons of Josiah would, for their great sins, be then punished. The sun of the temporal rule of the house of David set in unmitigated wickedness and sorrow. Of all its kings after Josiah, it is said, they did evil in the sight of the Lord; some were distinguished by guilt; all had miserable ends; some of them aggravated misery!

Zephaniah then probably finished his course before that 12th year of Josiah, (for this prophecy is one whole) and so just before Jeremiah was, in Josiah's 13th year, called to his office, which he fulfilled for half a century, perhaps for the whole age of man.

The foreground of the prophecy of Zephaniah remarkably coincides with that of Habakkuk. Zephaniah presupposes that prophecy and fills it up. Habakkuk had prophesied the great wasting and destruction through the Chaldeans, and then their destruction. That invasion was to extend beyond Judah (for it was said he shall scoff at kings<sup>e</sup>), but was to include it. The instrument of God having been named by Habakkuk, Zephaniah does not even allude to him. Rather he brings before Judah the other side, the agency of God Himself. God would not have them forget Himself in His instruments. Hence all is attributed to God. I will utterly consume all things from off the land, saith the Lord. I will consume man and beast; I will consume the fowls of the heaven, and the fishes of the sea, and the stumblingblocks with the wicked, and I will cut off man from the land, saith the Lord. I will also stretch out Mine hand upon Judah; and I will cut off the remnant of Baal. In the day of the Lord's sacrifice, I will punish the princes, &c. In the same day also I will punish all those &c. I will search Jerusalem with candles. The great day of the Lord is near, and I will bring distress upon &c. O Canaan, land of the Philistines, I will even destroy thee. The Lord will be terrible upon them. Ye Ethiopians also, ye shall be slain by My sword. And He will destroy Nineveh. The wicked of the people had said in their heart, The Lord will not do good, neither will He do evil. Zephaniah inculcates, throughout his brief prophecy, that there is nothing, good or evil, of which He is not the Doer or Overruler.

But the extent of that visitation is co-extensive with that prophesied by Habakkuk. Zephaniah indeed speaks rather of the effects, the desolation. But the countries, whose desolation or defeat he foretells, are the lands of those, whom the Chaldeans invaded, worsted, in part desolated. Besides Judah, Zephaniah's subjects are Philistia, Moab, Ammon, Ethiopia (which included Egypt), Nineveh. And here he makes a remarkable distinction corresponding with the events. Of the Ethiopians or Egyptians, he says only, ye shall be slain by My sword. Of Assyria he foretells<sup>b</sup> the entire and lasting desolation; the capitals of her palaces in the dust; her cedar-work bare; flocks, wild-beasts, pelican and hedgehog, taking up their abode in her. Moab and Ammon and Philistia have at first sight the two-fold, apparently contradictory, lot; the remnant of My people, God says, shall possess them; the coast shall be for the remnant of the house of Judah; and, that they should be a perpetual desolation. This also was to take place, after God had brought back His people out of captivity. Now all these countries were conquered by the Chaldeans, of which at the time there was no human likelihood. But they were not swept away by one torrent of conquest. Moab and Ammon were, at first, allies of Nebuchadnezzar, and rejoiced at the miseries of the people, whose prophets had foretold their destruction. But, beyond this, Nineveh was at that time more powerful than Egypt. Human knowledge could not have discerned, that Egypt should suffer defeat only, Nineveh should be utterly destroyed. It was the wont of the great conquerors of the East, not to destroy capitals, but to re-people them with subjects obedient to themselves. Nineveh had held Babylon by viceroys; in part she had held it under her own immediate rule. Why should not Babylon, if she conquered Nineveh, use the same policy? Humanly speaking, it was a mistake that she did not. It would have been a strong place against the inroads of the Medo-Persian empire. The Persians saw its value so far for military purposes, as to build some fort there<sup>d</sup>; and the Emperor Claudius, when he made it a colony, felt the importance of the well-chosen situation<sup>e</sup>. It is replaced by Mosul, a city of some "20000 to 40000" inhabitants. Even after its destruction, it was easier to rebuild it than to build a city on the opposite bank of the Tigris. God declared that it should be desolate. The prediction implied destruction the most absolute. It and its palaces were to be the abode of animals which flee the presence of man; and it perished<sup>f</sup>.

Again, what less likely than that Philistia, which had had the rule over Israel, strong in its almost impregnable towns, three of whose five cities were named for their strength, Gaza, strong; Ashdod, mighty; Ekron, deep-rooting; one of which, Ashdod, about this very time, resisted for 29 years the whole power of Egypt, and endured the longest siege of any city of ancient or modern times—what, to human foresight, less likely, than that Philistia should come under the power of the remnant of the house of Judah, when returned from their captivity? Yet it is absolutely foretold<sup>b</sup>. The sea-coast shall be for the remnant of the house of Judah; they shall feed thereupon: in the houses of Ashkelon they shall lie down in the evening. For the Lord their God shall visit them, and restore their captivity. As unlikely was it, that Moab and Ammon, who now had entered upon the territory of the two and a half tribes beyond Jordan, should themselves become the possession of the remnant of Judah. Yet so it was.

It is then lost labour, even for their own ends, when moderns, who believe not definite prophecy, would find out some enemy<sup>1</sup> whom Zephaniah may have had in mind in foretelling this wide destruction. It still remains that all that Zephaniah says beforehand was fulfilled. It is allowed that he could not foretell this through any human foresight. The avowed object in looking out for some power, formidable in Zephaniah's time, is, that he could not, by any human knowledge, be speaking of the Chaldeans. But the words stand there. They were written by Zephaniah, at a time when confessedly no human knowledge could have enabled man to predict this of the Chaldeans; nay, no human knowledge would have enabled any one to predict so absolutely a desolation so wide and so circumstantially delineated.

That school however has not been willing to acquiesce in this, that Zephaniah does not speak of the instrument, through whom this desolation was effected. They will have it, that they know, that Zephaniah had in his mind one, who was not the enemy of the Jews or of Nineveh or of Moab and Ammon, and through whom no even transient desolation of these countries was effected. The whole argument is a simple begging of the question. “<sup>c</sup>The Egyptians cannot be meant; for the Cushites, who are threatened<sup>2</sup>, themselves belong to the Egyptian army<sup>3</sup>, and Psammetichus only besieged Ashdod which he also took, without emblazoning ought greater on his shield<sup>4</sup>. The Chaldeans come still less into account, because they did not found an independent kingdom until B. C. 625, nor threaten Judæa until after Josiah's death. On the other hand an unsuspecting and well-accredited account has been preserved to us, that somewhere about this time the Scythians overflowed Palestine too with their hosts. Herodotus relates<sup>5</sup>, that the Scythians, after they had disturbed Cyaxares at the siege of Nineveh, turned towards Egypt; and when they had already arrived in Palestine, were persuaded by Psammetichus to return, and in their return plundered a temple in Ascalon.”

It is true that Herodotus says that “a large Scythian army did, under their king Madyes, burst into Asia in pursuit of the Cimmerians and entered Media,—keeping Mount Caucasus on the right,” and that “the Medes opposed and fought them and, being defeated, lost their rule<sup>6</sup>.”

It is true also that Herodotus relates, that “<sup>a</sup>they went thence towards Egypt, and when they were in Palestine-Syria, Psammetichus king of Egypt, meeting them, turned them by gifts and entreaties from going further; that when in their return they were in Ascalon, a city of Syria, whereas most of the Scythians passed by without harming ought, some few of them, being left behind, plundered the temple of Venus Ourania.” In this place also, it is true, Herodotus uses a vague expression, that “<sup>a</sup>for 28 years the Scythians ruled over Asia, and that all things were turned upside down by their violence and contempt. For besides the tributes, they exacted from each what they laid upon each, and beside the tribute, they drove together and took what each had. And most of them Cyaxares and the Medes entertaining as guests, intoxicated and slew. And then the Medes recovered their empire and became masters of what they held before.”

But, apart from the inconsistency of the period here assigned to their power, with other history, it appears from the account itself, that by “all Asia” Herodotus means “all upper Asia,” as he expresses himself more accurately, when relating the expedition of Darius against them. “<sup>a</sup>Darius wished to take revenge on the Scythians, because they first, making an inroad into Media and defeating in battle those who went against them, began the wrong. For the Scythians, as I have before said, ruled upper Asia for 28 years. For, pursuing the Cimmerians, they made an inroad into Asia, putting down the Medes from their rule; for these, before the Scythians came, ruled Asia.” The Asia then, which Herodotus supposes the Scythians to have ruled, is coextensive with the Asia which he supposes the Medes to have ruled previously. But this was all in the North; for having said that “<sup>a</sup>Phraortes subdued Asia, going from one nation to another,” he adds that, having brought Persia under his yoke, “he led an army against those Assyrians who had Nineveh, and there lost most of his army and his own life.” Apart then from the fabulousness of this supposed empire, established by Phraortes<sup>7</sup>, (Cyaxares having been the real founder of the Median empire,) it is plain that, according to Herodotus himself, the Asia, in which the Scythians plundered and received tribute, were the lands North of Assyria. The expedition against Egypt stands as an insulated predatory excursion, the object of which having been mere plunder, they were bought off by Psammetichus and returned (he tells us) doing no mischief<sup>8</sup> in their way, except that a few lingerers plundered a temple at Ascalon. It was to Media that they first came; the Medes, whom they defeated; the Median empire to which they succeeded; Cyaxares and the Medes, who treacherously destroyed most of them; the Medes, whose empire was restored by the destruction of some, and the return of the rest to their own land. With this agrees the more detailed account of the Scythians by Strabo, who impeaches the accuracy of the accounts of Herodotus<sup>9</sup>. Having spoken of the migrations of leaders, and by name, of “<sup>a</sup>Madyes the Scythian” (under whom Herodotus states the irruption to have taken place), he says, <sup>a</sup> i. 106. He uses the same wide expression as to Cyrus, after the defeat of Croesus. “Having subdued him, he thus ruled over all Asia,” (i. 130); whereas he had yet conquered Babylon.

"the Sacæ made the like inroad as the Cimmerians and the Trerians, some longer, some nigh at hand; for they took possession of Bactriana, and acquired the best land of Armenia, which they also left, named after them Sacasene, and advanced as far as to the Cappadocians and especially those on the Euxine, whom they now call of Pontus (Pontians). But the generals of the Persians who were at the time there, attacking them by night, while they were making a feast upon the spoils, utterly extirpated them." The direction which he says they took, is the same as that of the Cimmerians, whom Herodotus says that they followed. "The Cimmerians, whom they also call Trerians, or some tribe of them, often overrun the right side of the Pontus, sometimes making inroads on the Paphlagonians, at others, on the Phrygians. Often also the Cimmerians and Trerians made the like attacks, and they say that the Trerians and Cobus [their king] were, at last expelled by Madyes king of the [Scythians]." Strabo also explains, what is meant by the tributes, of which Herodotus speaks. He is speaking of the Nomadic tribes of the Scythians generally: "A tribute was, to allow them at certain stated times, to overrun the country [for pasturage] and carry off booty. But when they roamed beyond the agreement, there arose war, and again reconciliations and renewed war. Such was the life of the nomads, always setting on their neighbours and then being reconciled again."

The Scythians then were no object of fear to the Jews, whom they passed wholly unnoticed and probably unconscious of their existence in their mountain country, while they once and once only swept unharmed along the fertile tracts on the sea-shore, then occupied by the old enemies and masters of the Jews, the Philistines. But Herodotus must also have been misinformed as to the length of time, during which they settled in Media, or at least as to the period during which their presence had any sensible effects. For Cyaxares, whom he represents as having raised the siege of Nineveh, in consequence of the inroad of the Scythians into Media, came to the throne, according to the numbers of Herodotus, B. C. 633. For the reign of Cyaxares having lasted according to him 40 years<sup>b</sup>, that of Astyages 35<sup>c</sup>, and that of Cyrus 29<sup>d</sup>, these 104 years, counted back from the known date of the death of Cyrus, B.C. 529 or 530, bring us to B.C. 633 or 636 as the beginning of the reign of Cyaxares. But the invasion of the Scythians could not have taken place at the first accession of Cyaxares, since, according to Herodotus, he had already defeated the Assyrians, and was besieging Nineveh, when the Scythians burst into Media. According to Herodotus, moreover, Cyaxares "first distributed Asiatics into troops, and first ordered that each should be apart, spearmen, and archers and cavalry; for before, all were mixed pele-mele together." Yet it would not be in a very short time, that those who had been wont to fight in a confused mass, could be formed into an orderly and disciplined army. We could not then, any how, date the Scythian inroad, earlier than the second or third year of Cyaxares. On the other hand the date of the capture of Nineveh is fixed by the commencement of the Babylonian Empire, Babylon falling to Nabopolassar. The duration of that empire is measured by the reigns of its kings<sup>e</sup>, of whom, according to Ptolemy's Canon, Nabopolassar reigned 21 years; Nebuchadnezzar, (there called Nabocollasar) 43;

Evil-Merodach (Iluaroadam) 2; Neriglissar (Niricassolassar) 4; Nabunahit (Nabonadius with whom his son Belshazzar was co-regent) 17; in all 87 years; and it ends in an event of known date, the capture of Babylon by Cyrus, B. C. 538. The addition of the 87 years of the duration of the empire to that date carries us back to the date assigned to the capture of Nineveh by Nabopolassar in conjunction with Cyaxares, B.C. 625. The capture then of Nineveh was removed by 8 or 9 years only from that, which Herodotus gives as the time of the accession of Cyaxares, and since the attack upon Nineveh can hardly have been in his first year, and the last siege probably occupied two, the 28 years of Scythian dominion would dwindle down into something too inconsiderable for history. Probably they represent some period from their first incursion into Media, to the final return of the survivors, during which they marauded in Media and Upper Asia. The mode, by which "the greater part" (Herodotus tells us) were destroyed, intoxication and subsequent murder at a banquet, implies that their numbers were no longer considerable.

History, with the exception of that one marauding expedition towards Egypt, is entirely silent as to any excursions of the Scythians, except in the North. No extant document hints at any approach of theirs to any country mentioned by Zephaniah. There was no reason to expect any inroad from them. With the exception of Bactriana, which lies some 18 degrees East of Media and itself extended over some 7 degrees of longitude, the countries mentioned by Strabo lie, to what the kings of Assyria mention as the far North, Armenia, and thence they stretched out to the West, yet keeping mostly to the neighbourhood of the Euxine. Considering the occasion of the mention of the invasion of the Scythians, the relief which their invasion of Media gave to Nineveh, it is even remarkable that there is no mention of any ravages of theirs throughout Mesopotamia or Babylonia. Zephaniah speaks, not of marauding, but of permanent desolation of Assyria, Philistia, Moab, Ammon, and of destructive war also on Ethiopia. There is no reason to think that the Scythians approached any of these lands, except Philistia, which they passed through unharmed. The sacred writers mention even smaller nations, by whom God chastised Judah in their times, bands of the Syrians, of Moab, of the children of Ammon, as well as Assyria and Babylon. Ezekiel<sup>f</sup>, when he prophesies of the inroad of Northern nations, Meshech and Tubal, Gomer and and Togarmah, speaks of it as far removed in the future, prophesies not their destroying but their own destruction.

It does not affect the argument from prophecy, whether Zephaniah did or did not know, through whom the events, which he predicted, should be brought to pass. But, setting aside the question whether he had from the prophecies of Habakkuk and Isaiah, a human knowledge of the Chaldees, or whether God instructed him, how what he foretold should be accomplished, or whether God spread out before his mind that which was to be, apart from time, in prophetic vision, Zephaniah did picture what came to pass. But it is an intense paradox, when men, 2500 years after his date, assert, not only that Zephaniah's prophecies had no relation to the Chaldees, in whom his words were fulfilled, and who are the objects of the prophecies of Habakkuk and Jeremiah, but that they know, what must have been, and

(as they assert) what was in the prophet's mind; and that he had in his mind, not those in whom his words were fulfilled, but others in whom they were not fulfilled, to whom he does not allude in one single trait, who left no trace behind them, and whose march along an enemy's tract on the sea-coast was of so little account, that no contemporary historian, nor Josephus, even alludes to it<sup>1</sup>.

It has been already observed, that each prophet connects himself with one or more of those before them. They use the language of their predecessors in some one or more sentences, apparently with this precise object. They had overflowing fulness of words; yet they chose some saying of the former prophet, as a link to those before them. We have seen this in Amos<sup>1</sup>, then in Obadiah<sup>1</sup>, who uses the language of Balaam, David, Joel, Amos; of Jeremiah, in regard to Obadiah<sup>1</sup>; of Micah to his great predecessor, Micaiah, and Amos<sup>2</sup>; of Jeremiah, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Ezekiel to Micah<sup>3</sup>; of Nahum to Jonah<sup>4</sup>; and of Isaiah (I think), to Nahum<sup>5</sup>; of Habakkuk, to Isaiah and Micah<sup>6</sup>. It is in conformity with this, that Zephaniah, even more than those before him, uses language of earlier prophets. It arises, not (as people have been pleased to say) from any declension in the originality of prophets at his date, but from his subject. It has been said, "If any one desire to see the utterances of the prophets in brief space, let him read through this brief Zephaniah." The office of Zephaniah was not to forewarn of any instrument of God's judgements. The destruction is prophesied, not the destroyer. His prophecy is, more than those of most other prophets, apart from time, to the end of time. He prophesies of what shall be, not when it shall be, nor by whom. He does not "expect" or "anticipate" or "forebode!" He absolutely declares the future condition of certain nations; but not the how of its coming to pass. If Nineveh, Edom and Ammon had not been desolated, his prophecy would have been falsified; each fulfilment became the earnest of a larger fulfilment; but all shall not be completed until the earth and all that is therein shall be burned up.

It belongs to this character of Zephaniah, that he gathers from other prophets before him, especially Isaiah, Joel, Amos, Habakkuk, expressions relating to, or bearing on, judgement to come, or again to that his other great subject, God's love for the remnant of His people; yet mostly in fragments only and allusively. They were key-notes for those who knew the prophets. Thus, in calling on man to hushed submission before God, because a day of judgement was coming, he blends into one verse<sup>7</sup> Habakkuk's call, "hush before the Lord, and the warning words of Isaiah, Joel, Obadiah, "nigh is the day of the Lord; the image of the sacrifice, which God had commanded, and the remarkable word, consecrated, of God's instruments. The allusion is contained in single words, sacrifice, consecrated; the context in which they are embodied is different. The idea only is the same, that Almighty God maketh, as it were, a sacrifice to Himself of those who incorrigibly rebel against Him. Else Isaiah draws out the image at much length; *"A sword of the Lord is full of bloods; it is smeared with fat, with the blood of lambs and of goats; with the fat of kidneys of rams: for the Lord hath a sacrifice in Bozrah, and a great slaughter in the land of Edom. Jeremiah uses the image in equal fulness of the overthrow of Pharaoh-Necho at the Euphrates; "This is a day of the Lord God of hosts, a day of vengeance, that He may avenge Him of His adversaries: and the sword shall devour, and it shall be satiate and made drunk with blood; for the Lord God hath a sacrifice in the North country by the river Euphrates. Ezekiel expands it yet more boldly". Zephaniah drops everything local, and condenses the image into the words, The Lord hath prepared a sacrifice; He hath consecrated His guests, adding the new bold image, that they whom God employed were, as it were, His invited guests<sup>8</sup>, whom He consecrated<sup>9</sup> thereto.*

In like way, as to the day of the Lord itself, he accumulates all words of terror from different prophets; from Joel the words, "a day of darkness and of gloominess; a day of clouds and of thick darkness: to these he adds "of shouting and the sound of the trumpet, used by Amos in relation to the destruction of Moab; the two combinations, which precede, occur, the one in a different sense, the other with a slightly different grammatical inflexion, in Job<sup>10</sup>.

From Isaiah, Zephaniah adopts that characteristic picture of self-idolising, which brings down God's judgements on its pride; (the city) "that dwelleth securely, that said in her heart, I and no I besides.

Even where Isaiah says, "For a consumption and that decreed, the Lord God of hosts makes in the midst of all the earth and, slightly varying it, "For a consumption and that decreed, I have heard from the Lord God of hosts upon all the earth, Zephaniah, retaining the two first words, which occur in both places, says more concisely, "For a consumption, nought but terror, will He make all the inhabitants of the earth. Yet simple as the words are, he pronounced, that God would not only bring a desolation upon the earth, or in the midst of the earth, but would make its inhabitants one consumption. Nahum had said of Nineveh, "with an overflowing flood He will make the place thereof an utter consumption. The most forceful words are the simplest.

He uses the exact words of Isaiah, "From beyond the rivers of Cush, than which none can be simpler, and employs the word of festive procession, though in a different form<sup>11</sup>, and having thus connected his prophecy with Isaiah's, all the rest, upon which the prophecy turns, is varied.

In like way he adopts from Micah the three words<sup>12</sup>, her-that-halteth, and-will-gather her-that-is-driven-out. The context in which he resets them is quite different.

It has been thought, that the words, "I have heard the reproach of Moab, may have been suggested by those of Isaiah, who begins his lament over Moab, "We have heard of the pride of Moab; but the force and bearing of the <sup>1</sup> The name Σουδοπολις, which Josephus says the Greeks gave to Bethshan, (Ant. 12. 8. 5) and which they alone can have given, is manifestly, as being Greek, too late to contain any tradition as to the presence of the Scythians in Palestine, three centuries before the Greeks, under Alexander, became acquainted with Palestine. S. Jerome regarded it as a corruption of Succoth. He says on Gen. xxxiii. 17, "In the Hebrew is read Succoth (סוכה). words is altogether different, since it is God Who says, I have heard, and so He will punish.

The combination <sup>m</sup>, the exulters of pride, is common to him with Isaiah: its meaning is uncertain; but it is manifestly different in the two places, since the one relates to God, the other to man.

The words, <sup>n</sup> They shall build houses and shall not dwell therein; they shall plant vineyards and not drink the wine thereof, are from the original threat in Deuteronomy, from which also the two words, <sup>o</sup> They shall walk as the blind, may be a reminiscence, but with a conciseness of its own and without the characteristic expressions of Deuteronomy, adopted by other sacred writers: <sup>p</sup> They shall grope at noonday, as the blind gropeth in darkness.

Altogether these passages are evidence that Zephaniah is of later date than the prophecies in which the like language occurs; and the fact that he does employ so much language of his predecessors furnishes a strong presumption in any single case, that he in that case also adopted from the other sacred writer the language which they have in common.

It is chiefly on this ground, that a train of modern critics <sup>q</sup> have spoken disparagingly of the outward form and style of Zephaniah. It has however a remarkable combination of fullness with conciseness and force. Thus, he begins the enumeration of those upon whom the destruction should fall, with the words, <sup>r</sup> consuming I will consume all: to an enumeration co-extensive with the creation, he adds unexpectedly, <sup>s</sup> and the stumblingblocks with the wicked, anticipating our Lord's words of the Day of Judgement, <sup>t</sup> they shall gather the stumblingblocks and them that do iniquity: to the different idolatries he adds those of a divided faith, <sup>u</sup> swearers to the Lord and swearers by Malcham; to those who turned away from God he adds those who were unearnest in seeking Him <sup>v</sup>.

Again, after the full announcement of the destruction in the Day of the Lord, the burst, in those five words, <sup>w</sup> sift yourselves and sift (on) nation unlonged for, is, in suddenness and condensation, like Hosea; and so again, in five words, after the picture of the future desolation of Nineveh, the abrupt turn to Jerusalem, <sup>x</sup> Wo rebellious and-defiled (thou) oppressive city, and then follow the several counts of her indictment, in brief disjointed sentences, first negatively, as a whole; each in three or four words <sup>y</sup>, she-listened not to voice; she-received not correction; in-the-Lord she-trusted not; to-her-God she-approached not; then, in equally broken words, each class is characterised by its sins; <sup>z</sup> her-princes in-her-midst are roaring lions; her-judges evening wolves; not gnawed-they-bones on-the-morrow; her-prophets empty-habblers, men-of-deceits; her-priests profaned holiness, violated law. Then in sudden contrast to all this contumacy, neglect, despite of God, He Himself is exhibited as in the midst of her; the witness and judge of all; there, where they sinned. <sup>a</sup> The-Lord righteous in-her-midst; He-doeth not iniquity; by-morning-by-morning His-judgement He-giveth to-light; He-faileth not; and then in contrast to the holiness and the judgements of God, follows in four words, the perseverance of man in his shamelessness, and—the fruit of all this presence and doings of the Holy and Righteous God and Judge is, and-not knoweth the wrong-doer shame. Zephaniah uses the same disjoining of the clauses in the description of God's future manifestation of His love towards them. Again it is the same thought <sup>b</sup>, The-Lord thy-God (is) in-thy-midst; but now in love; mighty, shall-save; He-shall-rejoice over-thee with-joy; He-shall-keep-silence in-His-love; He-shall-rejoice over-thee with-jubilee. The single expressions are alike condensed; <sup>c</sup> she-hearkened not to-voice, stands for what Jeremiah says at such much greater length, how God had sent all His servants <sup>d</sup> the prophets, daily rising up early and sending them, but they hearkened not unto Me nor inclined their ear, but hardened their neck. The words <sup>e</sup> shall-be-silent in-His-love, in their primary meaning, express the deepest human love, but without the wonted image of betrothal.

<sup>f</sup> The whole people of Canaan reminds one of Hosea; <sup>g</sup> the-men-coagulated on-their-lees is much expanded by Jeremiah <sup>h</sup>, his word occurs before him in Job only and the song of Moses <sup>i</sup>. Single poetic expressions are, that Moab should become <sup>j</sup> the possession of briars, the word itself being framed by Zephaniah; in the description of the desolation of Nineveh, <sup>k</sup> a voice singeth in the window; desolation is on the threshold, the imagery is so bold, that modern criticism has thought that the word voice which occurs in the O. T. 328 times and with pronouns 157 times more, must signify "an owl," and desolation must stand for "a crow <sup>m</sup>." Very characteristic is the word, <sup>n</sup> He shall furnish all the gods of the earth, expressing with wonderful irony, the privation of their sacrifices, which was the occasion of the first Heathen persecutions of the Christians.

When then a writer, at times so concise and poetic as Zephaniah is in these places, is, at others, so full in his descriptions, this is not prolixity, but rather vivid picturing; at one time going through all the orders of creation <sup>o</sup>; at another, different classes of the ungodly <sup>p</sup>; at yet another, the different parts of the scared woe-stricken city <sup>q</sup>, to set before our eyes the universality of the desolation. Those who are familiar with our own great Northern poet of nature, will remember how the accumulation of names adds to the vividness of his descriptions. Yet here too there is great force in the individual descriptions, as when he pictures the petty plunderers for their master, and fill their masters' houses—not with wealth but—with violence and fraud <sup>r</sup>, all which remains of wealth gained by fraud and extortion being the sins themselves, which dwell in the house of the fraudulent to his destruction.

In the strictly prophetic part of his office, Jerusalem having been marked out by Micah and Isaiah before him, as the place where God would make the new revelation of Himself, Zephaniah adds, what our Lord revealed to the Samaritan woman, <sup>s</sup> that Jerusalem should no longer be the abiding centre of worship. <sup>t</sup> They shall worship Him, every man from his place, all the isles of the nations, is a prophecy which, to this day, is receiving an increasing accomplishment. It is a prophecy, not of the spread of Monotheism, but of the worship of Him, to Whose worship at that time a handful of Jews could with difficulty be brought to adhere, the desertion or corruption or association of Whose worship with idolatry Zephaniah had to denounce and to foretell its punishment. The love which God should then shew to His own is expressed in words, unequalled for tenderness; and in conformity to that love is the increasing growth of holiness, and the stricter requirements of God's holy justice. Again, Zephaniah has a prelude to our Blessed Lord's words, "to whom much is given, of him shall much be required", or His Apostle's, of the great awe in working out our salvation<sup>v</sup>. Progress is a characteristic and condition of the Christian life; "We beseech you, that as ye have received of us, how ye ought to walk and to please God, ye would abound more and more". Even so Zephaniah bids "all the meek of the earth, who have wrought His judgements or law to seek diligently that meekness, which had already characterised them, and that, not in view of great things, but, if so be they might be saved; it may be that ye may be hid in the day of the Lord's anger", as S. Peter saith, "If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" It is again remarkable, how he selects meekness, as the characteristic of the new state of things, which he promises. He anticipates the contrast in the Magnificat, in which the lowest lowliness was rewarded by the highest exaltation. As it is said there, "He hath put down the mighty from their seat and hath exalted the humble and meek, so the removal of the proud from within thee", and the "leaving of an afflicted and poor people within thee<sup>a</sup>," is the special promise by Zephaniah.

Little is said of the captivity. It is a future variously assumed<sup>b</sup>. Judah in the furthest lands, beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, is the daughter of My dispersed<sup>c</sup>; the whole earth is the scene of their shame<sup>d</sup>; their praises should be commensurate with their shame, when I turn back your captivity before your eyes<sup>e</sup>. But this turning away of their captivity is the only notice, that their punishment should be the going into captivity. The captivity itself is pre-supposed, as certain and as known. So neither are there any images from temporal exaltation. All pride should be removed, as utterly un-befitting God's holy presence: thou shalt no more be haughty in My holy mountain<sup>f</sup>. The words expressive of the abasement of those within her are proportionably strong, "My afflicted and poor". Some are wont, in these days, to talk of God's prophets as patriots. They were such truly, since they loved the land of the Lord with a Divine love. But what mere "patriot" would limit his promises to the presence of "a poor people in a low estate," with an unseen presence of God? The description belongs to His kingdom, which was not of this world<sup>h</sup>: the only king whom Zephaniah speaks of, the king of Israel<sup>i</sup>, is Almighty God. The blessing which he promises, is the corresponding blessing of peace, "Fear thou not; thou shalt not see evil any more, none shall make them afraid". But the words "Let not thy hands be slack", imply that they shall be aggressive on the world; that they were not to relax from the work which God assigned to them, the conversion of the world.

An allusion to the prophet Joel<sup>l</sup> makes it uncertain whether words of Zephaniah relate to the first Coming of our Lord, or the times which should usher in the Second, or to both in one; and so, whether, in accordance with his general character of gathering into one all God's judgements to His end, he is speaking of the first restoration of the one purified language of faith and hope, when "the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul", or whether he had his mind fixed rather on the end, when "the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in". The words also (since they may be taken either way<sup>o</sup>) leave it uncertain whether the Gentiles are spoken of as bringing in the people of God, (as they shall at the end) or whether the first conversion of the Jews, even in the most distant countries, is his subject.

In any case, Zephaniah had a remarkable office, to declare the mercy and judgement of God, judgements both temporal and final, mercies, not of this world, promised to a temper not of this world, "the wisdom which is from above, pure, peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy".

CHAPTER I.

THE word of the LORD which came unto Zephaniah the son of Cushi, the son of Gedaliah, the son of Amariah, the son of Hizkiah, in the days of Josiah the son of Amon, king of Judah.

CHAP. I., Ver. 1. The word of the Lord which came unto Zephaniah the son of Cushi, the son of Gedaliah, the son of Amariah, the son of Hezekiah. It seems likely that more forefathers of the Prophet are named than is the wont of Holy Scripture, because the last so named was some one remarkable. Nor is it impossible that Zephaniah should have been the great grandson of the king Hezekiah; for although Holy Scripture commonly names the one son only who is in the sacred line, and although there is one generation more than to Josiah, yet if each had a son early, Zephaniah might have been contemporary with Josiah. The names seem also mentioned for the sake of their meaning; at least it is remarkable how the name of God appears in most. Zephaniah, "whom the Lord hid;" Gedaliah, "whom the Lord made great;" Amariah, "whom the Lord promised;" Hezekiah, "whom the Lord strengthened."

2 I will utterly consume all things; better all<sup>1</sup>. The word is not limited to "things" "animate" or "inanimate" or "men;" it is used severally of each, according to the context; here, without limitation, of "all." God and all stand over against one another; God and all which is not of God or in God. God, he says, will utterly consume all from off the land [earth.] The prophet sums up in few words the subject of the whole chapter, the judgements of God from his own times to the day of Judgement itself. And this Day Itself he brings the more strongly before the mind, in that, with wonderful briefness, in two words which he conforms, in sound also, the one to the other, <sup>2</sup> he expresses the utter final consumption of all things. He expresses at once the intensity of action and blends their separate meanings, Taking away I will make an end of all; and with this he unites the words used of the flood, from off the face of the earth<sup>3</sup>. Then he goes through the whole creation as it was made, pairing man and beast, which Moses speaks of as created on the sixth day, and the creation of the fifth day, the fowls of the heaven and the fishes of the sea; and before each he sets the solemn word of God, I will end, as the act of God Himself. The words can have no complete fulfilment, until <sup>4</sup> the earth and the works that are therein shall be burned up, as the Psalmist too, having gone through the creation, sums up, <sup>5</sup> Thou takest away their breath, they die and return to their dust; and then speaks of the re-creation, <sup>6</sup> Thou sendest forth Thy Spirit, they are

2 I will utterly consume all things from off the land, saith the LORD.

3 I will consume man and beast; I will consume the fowls of the heaven, and the fishes of the sea, and the stumbling blocks with the wicked; and I will cut off man from off the land, saith the LORD.

created; and Thou renewest the face of the earth, and, old Thou hast laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the work of Thy hands; they shall perish, but Thou shalt endure, yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt Thou change them, and they shall be changed. Local fulfilments there may, in their degree, be. S. Jerome speaks as if he knew this to have been. "Even the brute animals feel the wrath of the Lord, and when cities have been wasted and men slain, there cometh a desolation and scarceness of beasts also and birds and fishes; witness Illyricum, witness Thrace, witness my native soil," [Stridon, a city on the confines of Dalmatia and Pannonia] "where, besides sky and earth and rampant brambles and deep thickets, all has perished." But although this fact, which he alleges, is borne out by natural history, it is distinct from the words of the prophet, who speaks of the fish, not of rivers (as S. Jerome) but of the sea, which can in no way be influenced by the absence of man, who is only their destroyer. The use of the language of the histories of the creation and of the deluge implies that the prophet has in mind a destruction commensurate with that creation. Then he foretells the final removal of offences, in the same words which our Lord uses of the general Judgement. <sup>9</sup> The Son of Man shall send forth His Angels and they shall gather out of His kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity.

3 The stumbling-blocks with the wicked. Not only shall the wicked be utterly brought to an end, or, in the other meaning of the word, gathered into bundles to be taken away, but all causes of stumbling too; everything, through which others can fall, which will not be until the end of all things. Then, he repeats, yet more emphatically, I will cut off the whole race of man from the face of the earth, and then he closes the verse, like the foregoing, with the solemn words, saith the LORD. All this shall be fulfilled in the Day of Judgement, and all other fulfilments are earnest of the final Judgement. They are witnesses of the ever-living presence of the Judge of all, that God does take account of man's deeds. They speak to men's conscience, they attest the existence of a Divine law, and therewith of the future complete manifestation of that law, of which they are individual sentences. Not until the prophet has brought this circle of judgements to their close, does he pass on to the particular judgements on Judah and Jerusalem.

<sup>1</sup> כל is used absolutely in a title of God, "Who maketh all," קָטָהּ, Is. xlv. 24; "Thou canst do all," i. e. art Almighty, Job xlii. 2; "Thou hast put all under his feet," Ps. viii. 7; and of man, "mine eye hath seen all," Job xiii. 1; and personally, gathering in one all which he had said of God's doings, with לֹא אֶקֶר "want not any thing," De. viii. 9. אֶקֶר, אֶקֶר "want of every thing," Jer. xlv. 18. De. xxviii. 48. 57; "all were [lit. was] ashamed" (with sing. verb) לֹא אֶקֶר Is. xxx. 5.

<sup>2</sup> So also Jeremiah viii. 18, in the same words, אֶקֶר אֶקֶר. Rashi makes them one word, supposing אֶקֶר to be for אֶקֶר. A. E. mentions those who thought that אֶקֶר in אֶקֶר was prefixed, as in אֶקֶר Is. xxviii. 28; but it is unnatural to assume a rare and irregular form, when the word אֶקֶר is the regular form from the common word אֶקֶר.

<sup>3</sup> אֶקֶר signifies "earth," almost always in the phrase אֶקֶר אֶקֶר, always in the phrase אֶקֶר אֶקֶר, unless they be limited by some addition, as "which the Lord swore that He would give thee." אֶקֶר אֶקֶר is thus used Gen. vi. 1, vii. 23, Ex. xxxiii.

16, Nu. xii. 8, De. vii. 6, xiv. 2, 2 Sam. xiv. 7, Is. xxiii. 17, Jer. xxv. 26, Ezek. xxxviii. 20. אֶקֶר אֶקֶר "from the face of the earth" occurs, unlimited by the context. Gen. iv. 14, vi. 7, vii. 4, viii. 8, Ex. xxxii. 12, De. vi. 15, 1 Sam. xx. 15, 1 Kgs. xiii. 34, Jer. xxviii. 16. Am. ix. 8. אֶקֶר is used of cultivable land, and so אֶקֶר אֶקֶר is used in connection with rain falling on the ground, 1 Kgs. xvii. 14; but אֶקֶר אֶקֶר suffers no exception, unless it be restrained by an addition.

2 Kin. 23. 4, 5.

4 I will also stretch out Mine Hand, as before on Egypt<sup>1</sup>. Judah had gone in the ways of Egypt and learned her sins, and sinned worse than Egypt<sup>2</sup>. The mighty Hand and stretched-out Arm, with which she had been delivered, shall be again stretched out, yet not for her but upon her, upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem. In this threatened destruction of all, Judah and Jerusalem are singled out, because judgement shall begin at the house of God. They who have sinned against the greater grace shall be most signally punished. Yet the punishment of those whom God had so chosen and loved is an earnest of the general judgement. This too is not a partial but a general judgement "upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem."

And, I will cut off the remnant of Baal, i. e. to the very last vestige of it. Isaiah unites <sup>4</sup>name and residue, as equivalents, together with the proverbial, posterity and descendant<sup>5</sup>. Zephaniah distributes them in parallel clauses, "the residue<sup>6</sup> of Baal and the name of the Chemarim." Good and evil have each a root, which remains in the ground, when the trunk has been hewn down. There is <sup>7</sup>a remnant according to the election of grace, when the rest have been blinded; and this is a <sup>8</sup>holy seed to carry on the line of God. Evil too has its remnant, which, unless diligently kept down, shoots up again, after the conversion of peoples or individuals. The <sup>9</sup>mind of the flesh remains in the regenerate also. The prophet foretells the complete excision of the whole remnant of Baal, which was fulfilled in it after the captivity, and shall be fulfilled as to all which it shadows forth, in the Day of Judgement. From this place; for in their phrenzy, they dared to bring the worship of Baal into the very temple of the Lord<sup>10</sup>. "Who would ever believe that in Jerusalem, the holy city, and in the very temple idols should be consecrated? Whoso seeth the ways of our times will readily believe it. For among Christians and in the very temple of God, the abominations of the heathen are worshipped. Riches, pleasures, honours, are they not idols which Christians prefer to God Himself?"

And the name of the Chemarim with the priests. Of the idolatrous priests<sup>12</sup> the very name shall be cut off, as God promises by Hosea, that He will <sup>13</sup>take away the names of Baalim, and by Zechariah, that He <sup>14</sup>will cut off the names of the idols out of the land. Yet this is more. Not the name only of the Chemarim, but themselves with their name, their posterity, shall be blotted out; still more, it is God Who cuts off all memory of them, blotting them out of the book of the living and out of His own. They had but a name before, <sup>15</sup>that they were living, but were dead. "The Lord

It is mostly "the rest," after others who had been named, yet still it may be the larger number; as, "the rest of those chosen," 1 Chr. xvi. 41; "the rest of their brethren, the priests and the Levites," Ezr. iii. 9 (8. Eng.); "the rest of the chief of the fathers," Ib. iv. 3; "the rest of their companions," Ib. 7; "the rest of the people," Neh. x. 29, xi. 1., "the rest of Israel," Ib. 20; "the rest of the Jews," Esth. ix. 16. shall take away names of vain glory, wrongly admired, out of the Church; yea, the very names of the priests with the priests who vainly flatter themselves with the name of Bishops and the dignity of Presbyters without their deeds. Whence he markedly says, not, and the deeds of priests with the priests, but the names; who only bear the false name of dignities, and with evil works destroy their own names." The priests are priests of the Lord, who live not like priests, corrupt in life and doctrine and corrupters of God's people<sup>17</sup>. The judgement is pronounced alike on what was intrinsically evil, and on good which had corrupted itself into evil. The title of priest is no where given to the priest of a false God, without some mention in the context, implying that they were idolatrous priests; as the priests of Dagon<sup>18</sup>, of the high-places as ordained by Jeroboam<sup>19</sup>, of Baal<sup>20</sup>, of Bethel<sup>21</sup>, of Ahab<sup>22</sup>, of those who were not gods<sup>23</sup>, of On, where the sun was worshipped<sup>24</sup>. The priests then were God's priests, who in the evil days of Manasseh had manifoldly corrupted their life or their faith, and who were still evil. The priests of Judah, with its kings its princes and the people of the land, were in Jeremiah's inaugural vision enumerated as those, who shall, God says, <sup>25</sup>fight against thee, but shall not prevail against thee. <sup>26</sup>The priests said not, Where is the Lord? and they that handle the law knew Me not. In the general corruption, <sup>27</sup>A wonderful and horrible thing is committed in the land, the prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule at their hands<sup>28</sup>; <sup>29</sup>the children of Israel and the children of Judah, their kings, their princes, their priests, and their prophets, and the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, have turned unto Me the back, and not the face. Jeremiah speaks specifically of heavy moral sins. <sup>30</sup>From the prophet even unto the priest every one dealeth falsely; <sup>31</sup>both prophet and priest are profane; <sup>32</sup>for the sins of her prophets, the iniquities of her priests, that have shed the blood of the just in the midst of her. And Isaiah says of their sensuality; <sup>33</sup>the priests and the prophets have erred through strong drink; they are swallowed up of wine, they are out of the way through strong drink.

5 And them that worship the host of heaven upon the [flat] housetops. This was fulfilled by Josiah who destroyed <sup>34</sup>the altars that were on the top of the upper chamber of Ahaz. Jeremiah speaks as if this worship was almost universal, as though well-nigh every roof had been profaned by this idolatry. <sup>35</sup>The houses of Jerusalem, and the houses of Judah, shall be defiled as the place of Tophet, because of all the houses upon whose roofs they have burned incense unto all the host of heaven, and have poured out drink-offerings unto other gods. <sup>36</sup>The Chaldeans that fight against this city, shall come and

In 2 Kings, where is the account of the first fulfilment of this prophecy, they appear as priests of the idolatrous high-places, distinct from the priests of Baal and of the host of heaven. set fire on this city, and burn it with the houses, upon whose roofs they have offered incense unto Baal, and poured out drink-offerings to other gods, to provoke Me to anger. They worshipped on the house-tops, probably to have a clearer view of that magnificent expanse of sky, <sup>1</sup>the moon and stars which God had ordained; the queen of heaven, which they worshipped instead of Himself. There is something so mysterious in that calm face of the moon, as it <sup>2</sup>walketh in beauty; God seems to have invested it with such delegated influence over the seasons and the produce of the earth, that they stopped short in it, and worshipped the creature rather than the Creator. Much as men now talk of "Nature," admire "Nature," speak of its "laws," not as laws imposed upon it, but inherent in it, laws affecting us and our well-being; only not in their ever-varying vicissitudes, <sup>3</sup>doing whatsoever God commandeth them upon the face of the world in the earth, whether for correction, or for His land or for mercy! The idolaters <sup>4</sup>worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, Who is blessed for ever; moderns equally make this world their object, only they idolise themselves and their discoveries, and worship their own intellect.

This worship on the house-tops individualised the public idolatry; it was a rebellion against God, family by family; a sort of family-prayer of idolatry. <sup>5</sup>Did we, say the mingled multitude to Jeremiah, make our cakes to worship her, and pour out our drink-offerings unto her, without our men? Its family character is described in Jeremiah. <sup>6</sup>The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead the dough to make cakes to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto other gods. The idolatry spread to other cities. <sup>7</sup>We will certainly do, they say, as we have done, we and our fathers, our kings and our princes, in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem. The incense went up continually as a memorial to God from the Altar of incense in the temple: the roofs of the houses were so many altars, from which, street by street and house by house, the incense went up to her, for whom they dethroned God, the queen of heaven. It was an idolatry, with which Judah was especially besotted, believing that they received all goods of this world from them and not from God. When punished for their sin, they repented of their partial repentance and maintained to Jeremiah that they were punished for <sup>8</sup>leaving off to burn incense to the queen of heaven.

And them that worship the Lord, but with a divided heart and service; that swear by [rather <sup>9</sup>to] the Lord, swear fealty and loyal allegiance to Him, while they do acts which deny it, in that they swear by Malcham, better [it is no appellative although allied to one] their king<sup>10</sup>, most probably, I think, "Moloch."

This idolatry had been their enduring idolatry in the wilderness, after the calves had been annihilated; it is the worship, against which Israel is warned by name in the law<sup>11</sup>; then, throughout the history of the Judges, we hear of the kindred idolatry of Baal<sup>12</sup>, the Lord (who was called also "eternal king" and from whom individuals named themselves "son of [the] king," "servant of [the] king"<sup>14</sup>), or the manifold Baals<sup>15</sup> and Ashtaroth or Astarte. But after these had been removed on the preaching of Samuel<sup>16</sup>, this idolatry does not reappear in Judah until the intermarriage of Jehoram with the house of Ahab<sup>17</sup>. The kindred and equally horrible worship of <sup>18</sup>Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon, was brought in by Solomon in his decay, and endured until his high-place was defiled by Josiah<sup>19</sup>. It is probable then that this was their king<sup>20</sup>, of whom Zephaniah speaks, whom Amos<sup>21</sup> and after him Jeremiah, called their king; but speaking of Ammon. Him, the king of Ammon, Judah adopted as their king. They owned God as their king in words; Molech they owned by their deeds; they worshipped and swore fealty to the Lord and they swore by their king; his name was familiarly in their mouths; to him they appealed as the Judge and witness of the truth of their words, his displeasure they invoked on themselves, if they swore falsely. <sup>22</sup>Those in error were wont to swear by heaven, and, as matter of reverence to call out, 'By the king and lord Sun.' Those who do so must of set purpose and wilfully depart from the love of God, since the law expressly says, <sup>23</sup>Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and serve Him alone, and swear by His Name.<sup>24</sup>

The former class who worshipped on the roofs were mere idolaters. These worshipped, as they thought, the Lord, bound themselves solemnly by oath to Him, but with a reserve, joining a hateful idol to Him, in that they, by a religious act, owned it too as god. The act which they did was in direct words, or by implication, forbidden by God. The command to swear by the Lord implied that they were to swear by none else. It was followed by the prohibition to go after other gods<sup>25</sup>. Contrariwise to swear by other gods was forbidden as a part of their service. <sup>26</sup>Be very courageous to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the Law of Moses, neither make mention of the name of their gods, nor cause to swear by them, neither serve them, but cleave unto the Lord your God. <sup>26</sup>How shall I pardon thee for this? Thy children have forsaken Me, and have sworn by those who are no gods. <sup>27</sup>They taught My people to swear by Baal. They thought perhaps that in that they professed to serve God, did the greater homage to Him, professed and bound themselves to be His, (such is the meaning of swear to the Lord) they might, without renouncing His service, do certain things, swear by their king, although in effect they thereby owned him also as god. To such Elijah said, <sup>28</sup>How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow Him; but if Baal, then follow him; and God by Jeremiah rejects with abhorrence such divided service. <sup>29</sup>Ye trust in lying words, which will not profit. Will ye steal, murder, commit adultery, swear falsely, and burn incense unto Baal, and walk after other gods, and come and stand before Me in this house, which is called by My name, saying, We are delivered to do all these abominations. And Hosea, <sup>1</sup> Neither go ye to Beth-aven, and swear there, The Lord liveth.

Such are Christians, <sup>2</sup> who think that they can serve together the world and the Lord, and please two masters, God and Mammon; who, being soldiers of Jesus Christ and having sworn fealty to Him, <sup>3</sup> entangle themselves with the affairs of this life and offer the same image to God and to Cæsar." To such, God, Whom with their lips they own, is not their God; their idol is, as the very name says, their king, whom alone they please, displeasing and dishonouring God. We must not only fear, love, honour God, but love, fear, honour all besides for Him Alone.

6 And them that are turned back from [lit. have turned themselves back from following after<sup>4</sup>] the Lord. From this half-service, the prophet goes on to the avowed neglect of God, by such as wholly fall away from Him, not setting His Will or law before them, but turning away from Him. It is their misery that they were set in the right way once, but themselves turned themselves back, now no longer following God, but <sup>5</sup> their own lusts, drawn away and enticed by them. How much more Christians, before whose eyes Christ Jesus is set forth, not as a Redeemer only but as an Example that they should <sup>6</sup> follow His steps!

And those that have not sought the Lord, nor enquired for Him. This is marked to be a distinct class. And those who. These did not openly break with God, or turn away overtly from Him; they kept (as men think) on good terms with Him, but, like the slothful servant, rendered Him a listless heartless service. Both words express diligent search<sup>7</sup>. God is not found then in a careless way. They who seek Him not diligently<sup>8</sup>, do not find Him. Strive, our Lord says, <sup>9</sup> to enter in at the strait gate; for many, I say unto you, shall seek to enter in, and shall not be able. She who had lost the one piece of silver, sought diligently<sup>10</sup>, till she had found it.

Thus he has gone through the whole cycle. First, that most horrible and cruel worship of Baal, the idolatrous priests and those who had the name of priests only, mingled with them, yet not openly apostatising; then the milder form of idolatry, the star-worshippers; then those who would unite the worship of God with idols, who held themselves to be worshippers of God, but whose real king was their idol; then those who openly abandoned God; and lastly those who held with Him, just to satisfy their conscience-qualms, but with no heart-service. And so, in words of Habakkuk and in reminiscence of his awful summons of the whole world before God, he sums up;

7 Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord God. [lit. Hush, in awe from the Face of God.] In the Presence of God, even the righteous say from their inmost heart, <sup>11</sup> I am vile, what shall I answer Thee? I will lay mine hand upon my mouth. <sup>12</sup> Now mine eye seeth Thee, wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes. <sup>13</sup> Enter not into judge- ment with Thy servant, O Lord; for in Thy sight shall no man living be justified. How much more must the <sup>14</sup> man without the wedding garment be speechless, and every false plea, with which he deceived himself, melt away before the Face of God! The voice of God's Judgement echoes in every heart, <sup>15</sup> we indeed justly.

For the Day of the Lord is at hand. Zephaniah, as is his wont, grounds this summons, which he had renewed from Habakkuk, to hushed silence before God, on Joel's prophetic warning<sup>16</sup>, to shew that it was not yet exhausted. A day of the Lord, of which Joel warned, had come and was gone; but it was only the herald of many such days; judgements in time, heralds and earnest, and, in their degree, pictures of the last which shall end time.

<sup>17</sup> All time is God's, since He Alone is the Lord of time; yet that is specially said to be His time when He doth anything special. Whence He saith, <sup>18</sup> My time is not yet come; whereas all time is His." The Day of the Lord is, in the first instance, <sup>19</sup> the day of captivity and vengeance on the sinful people, as a forerunner of the Day of Judgement, or the day of death to each, for this too is near, since, compared to eternity, all the time of this world is brief.

For the Lord hath prepared a sacrifice. God had rejected sacrifices, offered amid unrepented sin; they were <sup>20</sup> an abomination to Him. When man will not repent and offer himself as <sup>21</sup> a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, God, at last, rejects all other outward oblations, and the sinner himself is the sacrifice and victim of his own sins. The image was probably suggested by Isaiah's words, <sup>22</sup> The Lord hath a sacrifice in Bozrah, and a great slaughter in the land of Idumea; and Jeremiah subsequently uses it of the overthrow of Pharaoh at the Euphrates, <sup>23</sup> This is the day of the Lord of Hosts; that He may avenge Him of His adversaries; for the Lord God hath a sacrifice in the north country by the river Euphrates. <sup>24</sup> The Lord hath made all things for Himself, yea even the wicked for the day of evil. All must honour God, either fulfilling the will of God and the end of their own being and of His love for them, by obeying that loving Will with their own free-will, or, if they repudiate it to the end, by suffering it.

He hath bid [lit. sanctified<sup>25</sup>] His guests. God had before, by Isaiah, called the heathen whom He employed to punish Babylon, <sup>26</sup> My sanctified ones. Zephaniah, by giving the title to God's instruments against Judah, declares that themselves, having become in deeds like the heathen, were as heathen to Him. The instruments of His displeasure, not they, were so far His chosen, His called<sup>27</sup>. Jeremiah repeats the saying, <sup>28</sup> Thus saith the Lord against the house of the king of Judah;—I have sanctified against thee destroyers, a man and his weapons. That is, so far, a holy war in the purpose of God, which fulfils His will; whence Nebuchadnezzar was <sup>29</sup> His servant, avenging His wrongs<sup>30</sup>. <sup>31</sup> To be sanctified, here denotes not the laying aside of iniquity, nor the participation of the Holy Ghost, but, as it were, to be fore-

9 In the same day also will I punish all those that leap on the threshold, which fill ordained and chosen to the fulfilment of this end." That is in a manner hallowed, which is employed by God for a holy end, though the instrument, its purposes, its aims, its passions, be in themselves unholy. There is an awe about "the scourges of God." As with the lightning and the tornado, there is a certain presence of God with them, in that through them His Righteousness is seen; although they themselves have as little of God as the wind and storm which fulfil His word. Those who were once admitted to make offerings to God make themselves sacrifices to His wrath; these, still heathen and ungodly and in all besides reprobate, are His Priests, because in this, although without their will, they do His Will.

8 I will punish [lit. visit upon]. God seems oftentimes to be away from His own world. Men plot, design, say, in word or in deed, who is Lord over us? God is, as it were, a stranger in it, or as a man, who hath taken a journey into a far country. God uses our own language to us. I will visit, inspecting, (so to say), examining, sifting, reviewing, and when man's sins require it, allowing the weight of His displeasure to fall upon them.

The princes. The prophet again, in vivid detail (as his characteristic is), sets forth together sin and punishment. Amid the general chastisement of all, when all should become one sacrifice, they who sinned most should be punished most. The evil priests had received their doom. Here he begins anew with the mighty of the people and so goes down, first to special spots of the city, then to the whole, man by man. Josiah being a godly king, no mention is made of him. Thirteen years before his death<sup>1</sup>, he received the promise of God, because thine heart was tender, and thou hast humbled thyself before the Lord—I will gather thee unto thy fathers, and thou shalt be gathered unto thy grave in peace, and thou shalt not see all the evil which I will bring upon this place. In remarkable contrast to Jeremiah, who had to be, in detail and continual pleading with his people, a prophet of judgement to come, until those judgements broke upon them, and so was the reprove of the evil sovereigns who succeeded Josiah, Zephaniah has to pronounce God's judgements only on the princes and the king's children. Jeremiah, in his inaugural vision, was forewarned, that <sup>2</sup>the kings of Judah, its princes, priests, and the people of the land should war against him, because he should speak unto them all which God should command him. And thenceforth Jeremiah implads or threatens kings and the princes together<sup>3</sup>. Zephaniah contrariwise, his office lying wholly within the reign of Josiah, describes the princes again as roaring lions, but says nothing of the king, as neither does Micah<sup>4</sup>, in the reign, it may be, of Jotham or Hezekiah. Isaiah speaks of princes, as rebellious and companions of thieves. Jeremiah speaks of them as idolaters<sup>5</sup>. They appear to have had considerable influence, which on one occasion they employed in defence of Jeremiah<sup>6</sup>, but mostly for evil<sup>7</sup>. Zedekiah enquired of Jeremiah secretly for fear of them<sup>8</sup>. They brought destruction upon themselves by what men praise, their resistance to Nebuchadnezzar, but against the declared mind of God. Nebuchadnezzar unwittingly fulfilled the prophet's word, when he <sup>11</sup>slew all the nobles of Judah, the eunuch who was over the war, and seven men of them that were near the king's person, and the principal scribe of the host.

And the king's children. Holy Scripture mentions chief persons only by name. Isaiah had prophesied the isolated lonely loveless lot of descendants of Hezekiah who should be eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon<sup>12</sup>, associated only with those intriguing pests of Eastern courts<sup>13</sup>, a lot in itself worse than the sword (although to Daniel God overruled it to good) and Zedekiah's sons were slain before his eyes and his race extinct. Jehoiakim died a disgraced death, and Jehoiachin was imprisoned more than half the life of man.

And all such as are clothed with strange apparel. Israel was reminded by its dress, that it belonged to God. It was no great thing in itself; a band of dark blue<sup>14</sup> upon the fringes at the four corners of their garments. But the band of dark blue was upon the high-priest's mitre, with the plate engraved, <sup>15</sup>Holiness to the Lord, fastened upon it; with a band of dark blue also was the breastplate<sup>16</sup> bound to the ephod of the high-priest. So then, simple as it was, it seems to have designated the whole nation, as <sup>17</sup>a kingdom of priests, an holy nation. It was appointed to them, <sup>18</sup>that ye may look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the Lord and do them, and that ye seek not after your own heart and your own eyes, after which ye use to go a whoring; that ye may remember and do all My commandments, and be holy unto your God. They might say, "it is but a band of blue;" but the band of blue was the soldier's badge, which marked them as devoted to the service of their God; indifference to or shame of it involved indifference to or shame of the charge given them therewith, and to their calling as a peculiar people. The choice of the strange apparel involved the choice to be as the nations of the world; <sup>19</sup>we will be as the heathen, as the families of the countries.

All luxurious times copy foreign dress, and with it, foreign manners and luxuries; whence even the heathen Romans were zealous against its use. It is very probable that with the foreign dress foreign idolatry was imported<sup>20</sup>. The Babylonian dress was very gorgeous, such as was the admiration of the simpler Jews. <sup>21</sup>Her captains and rulers clothed in perfection, girded with girdles upon their loins, with flowing dyed attire upon their heads. Ezekiel had to frame words to express the Hebrew idea of their beauty. Jehoiakim is reproved among other things for his luxury<sup>22</sup>. Outward dress always betokens the inward mind, and in its turn acts upon it. An estranged dress betokened an estranged heart, whence it is used as an image of the whole spiritual mind<sup>23</sup>. <sup>24</sup>The garment of the sons of the king and the apparel of princes which we receive in Baptism, is Christ, according to that, Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and Put ye on bowels of mercy, goodness, humility, patience, and the rest. 10 And it shall come to pass in that day, Before CHRIST
cir. 630. saith the Lord, that there shall be the noise heaven according to our Creator, and to <sup>1</sup>lay aside the clothing of the old man with his deeds. Whereas then we ought to be clothed in such raiment, for mercy we put on cruelty, for patience, impatience, for righteousness, iniquity; in a word, for virtues, vices; for Christ, Antichrist. Whence it is said of such an one, <sup>2</sup>He is clothed with cursing as with a garment. These the Lord will visit most manifestly at His Coming." "Thinkest thou that hypocrisy is strange apparel? Of a truth. For what stranger apparel than sheeps' clothing to ravening wolves? What stranger than for him who <sup>4</sup>within is full of iniquity, to appear outwardly righteous before men?"

9 I will punish all those that leap on the threshold. Neither language nor history nor context allow this to be understood of the idolatrous custom of Ashdod, not to tread on the threshold<sup>5</sup> of the temple of Dagon. It had indeed been a strange infatuation of idolatry, that God's people should adopt an act of superstitious reverence for an idol in the very instance in which its nothingness and the power of the true God had been shewn. Nothing is indeed too brutish for one who chooses an idol for the true God, preferring Satan to the good God. Yet the superstition belonged apparently to Ashdod alone; the worship of Dagon, although another form of untrue worship, does not appear, like that of Baal, to have fascinated the Jews; nor would Zephaniah, to express a rare superstition, have chosen an idiom, which might more readily express the contrary, that they "leapt on the threshold," not over it<sup>6</sup>. They are also the same persons, who leap on the threshold, and who fill their masters' houses with violence and deceit. Yet this relates, not to superstition, but to plunder and goods unjustly gotten. As then, before, he had declared God's judgements upon idolatry, so does he here upon sins against the second table, whether by open violence, or secret fraud, as do also Habakkuk<sup>7</sup>, and Jeremiah<sup>8</sup>. All, whether open or hidden from man, every wrongful dealing, (for every sin as to a neighbour's goods falls under these two, violence or fraud) shall be avenged in that day. Here again all which remains is the sin. They enriched, as they thought, their masters, by art or by force; they schemed, plotted, robbed; they succeeded to their heart's wish; but, "ill-gotten, ill-spent!" They filled their masters' houses quite full; but wherewith? with violence and deceit, which witnessed against them, and brought down the judgements of God upon them.

10 A cry from the fish-gate. The fish-gate was probably in the North of the wall of the second city. For in Nehemiah's rebuilding, the restoration began at the sheep-gate<sup>9</sup>, (so called doubtless, because the sheep for the sacrifices were brought in by it) which, as being near the temple, was repaired by the priests; then it ascended Northward, by two towers, the towers of Meah and Hananeel; then two companies repaired some undescribed part of the wall<sup>10</sup>, and then another company built the fish-gate<sup>11</sup>. Four companies are then mentioned, who repaired, in order, to the old gate, which was repaired by another company<sup>12</sup>. Three more companies repaired beyond these; and they left Jerusalem unto the broad wall<sup>13</sup>. After three more sections repaired by individuals, two others repaired a second measured portion, and the tower of the furnaces<sup>14</sup>. This order is reversed in the account of the dedication of the walls. The people being divided<sup>15</sup> into two great companies of them that give thanks, some place near the tower of the furnaces was the central point, from which both parted to encompass the city in opposite directions. In this account, we have two additional gates mentioned, the gate of Ephraim<sup>16</sup>, between the broad wall and the old gate, and the prison-gate, beyond the sheep-gate, from which the repairs had begun. The gate of Ephraim had obviously not been repaired, because, for some reason, it had not been destroyed. Else Nehemiah, who describes the rebuilding of the wall so minutely, must have mentioned its rebuilding. It was obviously to the North, as leading to Ephraim. But the tower of Hananeel must have been a very marked tower. In Zechariah Jerusalem is measured from North to South, <sup>17</sup>from the tower of Hananeel unto the king's vinepresses. It was then itself at the North-East corner of Jerusalem, where towers were of most importance to strengthen the wall, and to command the approach to the wall either way. The fish-gate then, lying between it and the gate of Ephraim, must have been on the North side of the city, and so on the side where the Chaldean invasions came; yet it must have been much inside the present city, because the city itself was enlarged by Herod Agrippa on the North, as it was unaccountably contracted on the South<sup>18</sup>. The then limits of Jerusalem are defined. For Josephus thus describes the second wall. "It took its beginning from that gate which they called Gennath, which belonged to the first wall; it only encompassed the northern quarter of the city and reached as far as the tower of Antonia." The tower of Antonia was situated at the North-West angle of the corner of the temple. The other end of the wall, the Gennath or garden gate, must have opened on cultivated land; and Josephus speaks of the gardens on the N. and N. W. of the city which were destroyed by Titus in levelling the ground<sup>20</sup>. But near the tower of Hippicus, the North-Western extremity of the first wall, no ancient remains have been discovered by excavation<sup>21</sup>; but they have been traced North, from "an ancient Jewish semi-circular arch, resting on piers 18 feet high, now buried in rubbish." These old foundations have been traced at three places<sup>22</sup> in a line on the East of the Holy Sepulchre (which lay consequently outside the city) up to the judgement gate, but cavating and removing the rubbish accumulated over the place during so many centuries, in retracing the walls, in examining the monuments and ancient remains, and in penetrating and traversing the conduits and vaults."—"I have," he says, "made excavations and watched those made by others, have formed intimacies with the inhabitants of the country, have sought for information on the spot, regardless of personal risk, have worked with my own hands underground, and so have obtained much knowledge of that which lies below the surface of the soil in Jerusalem." Jerusalem explored Prel. p. viii.

There is a trace of this explanation in the Chald., "who walk in the laws of the Philistines," and in S. Jerome, doubtless from his Jewish teachers. Isaiah's reproof that they have soothsayers like the Philistines, ii. 6, is altogether different.

not North of it<sup>1</sup>. The line from West to East, i. e., to the tower of Antonia, is marked generally by "very large stones, evidently of Jewish work, in the walls of houses, especially in the lower parts<sup>2</sup>." They are chiefly in the line of the Via Dolorosa.

The fish-gate had its name probably from a fish-market (markets being in the open places near the gates<sup>3</sup>) the fish being brought either from the lake of Tiberias or from Joppa. Near it, the wall ended, which Manasseh, after his restoration from Babylon<sup>4</sup>, built without the city of David, on the West side of Gihon, in the valley. This, being unprotected by its situation, was the weakest part of the city. "The most ancient of the three walls could be considered as impregnable, as much on account of its extreme thickness, as of the height of the mountain on which it was built, and the depth of the valleys at its base, and David, Solomon and the other kings neglected nothing to place it in this state." Where they had made themselves strong, there God's judgement should find them.

And a howling from the second city, as it is supplied in Nehemiah, who mentions the prefect set over it<sup>5</sup>. It was here that Huldah the prophetess lived<sup>7</sup>, who prophesied the evils to come upon Jerusalem, after Josiah should be gathered to his grave in peace. It was probably the lower city, which was enclosed by the second wall. It was a second or new city, as compared to the original city of David, on Mount Moriah. On this the enemy who had penetrated by the fish-gate would first enter; then take the strongest part of the city itself. Gareb<sup>8</sup> and Bezetha were outside of the then town; they would then be already occupied by the enemy before entering the city.

A great crashing from the hills. These are probably Zion, and Mount Moriah on which the temple stood, and so the capture is described as complete. Here should be not a cry or howling only, but an utter destruction<sup>9</sup>. Mount Moriah was the seat of the worship of God; on Mount Zion was the state, and the abode of the wealthy. In human sight they were impregnable. The Jebusites mocked at David's siege, as thinking their city impregnable<sup>10</sup>; but God was with David and he took it. He and his successors fortified it yet more, but its true defence was that the Lord was round about His people<sup>11</sup>, and when He withdrew His protection, then this natural strength was but their destruction, tempting them to resist first the Chaldeans, then the Romans. Human strength is but a great crash, falling by its own weight and burying its owner. "This threefold cry<sup>12</sup>, from three parts of the city, had a fulfilment before the destruction by the Romans. In the lower part of the city Simon tyrannised, and in the middle John raged, and there was a great crashing from the hills, i. e., from the temple and citadel where was Elcazar, who stained the very altar of the temple with blood, and in the courts of the Lord made a pool of blood of divers corpses." "In the assaults of an enemy the inhabitants are ever wont to flee to the tops of the hills, thinking that the difficulty of access will be a hindrance to him, and will cut off the assaults of the pursuers. But when God smiteth, and requireth of the despisers the penalties of their sin, not the most towered city nor impregnable circuits of walls, not height of hills, or rough rocks, or pathless difficulty of ground, will avail to the sufferers. Repentance alone saves, softening the Judge and allaying His wrath, and readily inviting the Creator in His inherent goodness to His appropriate gentleness. Better is it, with all our might to implore that we may not offend Him. But since human nature is prone to evil, and in many things we all offend, let us at least by repentance invite to His wonted clemency the Lord of all, Who is by nature kind."

11 Howl, ye inhabitants of Maktesh, lit. Mortar<sup>13</sup>, "in which," S. Jerome says, "corn is pounded; a hollow vessel, and fit for the use of medical men, in which properly ptisans are wont to be beaten (or made). Striking is it, that Scripture saith not, 'who dwell in the valley or in the alley,' but who dwell in the mortar, because as corn, when the pestle striketh, is bruised, so the army of the enemy shall rush down upon you<sup>14</sup>." The place intended is probably so much of the valley of the Tyropæon which intersected Jerusalem from North to South, as was enclosed by the second wall, on the North, and the first wall on the South. The valley "extended as far as the fountain of Siloam," and united with the valley of Jehoshaphat a little below Ophel. It was "full of houses," and, from its name as well as from its situation, it was probably the scene of petty merchandise, where the occasions in which men could and did break the law and offend God, were the more continual, because they entered into their daily life, and were a part of it. The sound of the pestle was continually heard there; another sound should thereafter be heard, when they should not bruise, but be themselves bruised. The name Maktesh was probably chosen to express how their false hopes, grounded on the presence of God's temple among them while by their sins they profaned it, should be turned into true fears. They had been and thought themselves Mikdash, "a holy place, sanctuary;" they should be Maktesh<sup>15</sup>, wherein all should be utterly bruised in pieces.

"Whoso considereth the calamities of that siege, and how the city was pressed and hemmed in, will feel how aptly he calls them the inhabitants of a mortar; for, as grains of corn are brought together into a mortar, to the end that, when the pestle descendeth, being unable to fly

A similar discovery was made by the Mufti in strengthening his house at the Station of Simon of Cyrene, and by the Effendi Soliman Giari, opposite to the Mufti's house on the North. The Armenian Catholic monks requested me to examine and level a piece of land, at the Station of the first fall of Christ; which, as representative of his nation, he had just bought. In the lower part of the wall enclosing it on the north, very large stones and an ancient gate were found. In the foundations of the Austrian hospice, laid in 1857, to the north of the Armenian property, large stones were discovered, and also further to the East, in the new convent of the Daughters of Zion." off, they may be bruised, so the people flowing together, out of all the countries of Judæa, was narrowed in by a sudden siege, and through the savage cruelty of the above leaders of the sedition, was unutterably tortured from within, more than by the enemy without."

For all the merchant people [lit. the people of Canaan] are cut down; i. e., "they who in deeds are like the people of Canaan," according to that, <sup>2</sup> Thou art of Canaan and not of Judah, and, <sup>3</sup> Thy father is an Amorite and thy mother a Hittite. So our Lord says to the reprobate Jews, <sup>4</sup> Ye are of your father the devil.

All they that bear [lit. <sup>5</sup> all laden with] silver are cut off. The silver, wherewith they lade themselves, being gotten amiss, is a load upon them, weighing them down until they are destroyed.

12 I will search [lit. diligently]. The word is always used of a minute diligent search, whereby places, persons, things, are searched and sifted one by one in every corner, until it be found whether a thing be there or no<sup>6</sup>. Hence also of the searching out of every thought of the heart, either by God<sup>7</sup>, or in repentance by the light of God<sup>8</sup>.

Jerusalem with candles: so that there should be no corner, nor lurking-place so dark, but that the guilty should be brought to light. The same diligence, which Eternal Wisdom used, to seek and to save that which was lost, <sup>9</sup> lighting a candle and searching diligently, till It find each lost piece of silver, the same shall Almighty God use that no hardened sinner shall escape. <sup>10</sup> What the enemy would do, using unmingled phrenzy against the conquered, that God fitteth to His own Person, not as being Himself the Doer of things so foreign, but rather permitting that what comes from anger should proceed in judgement against the ungodly." It was an image of this, when, at the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans, they <sup>11</sup> dragged out of common sewers and holes and caves and tombs, princes and great men and priests, who for fear of death had hid themselves." How much more in that Day when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed by Him Who <sup>12</sup> searcheth the hearts and reins, and to Whose Eyes<sup>13</sup>, which are like flaming Fire, all things are naked and open! The candles wherewith God searcheth the heart, are men's own consciences<sup>14</sup>, His Own revealed word<sup>15</sup>, the lives of true Christians<sup>16</sup>. These, through the Holy Ghost in each, may enlighten the heart of man, or, if he takes not heed, will rise in judgement against him, and shew the falsehood of all vain excuses. <sup>17</sup> One way of escape only there is. If we judge ourselves, we shall not be judged. I will search out my own ways and my desires, that He Who shall search out Jerusalem with candles, may find nothing in me, unsought and unsifted. For He will not twice judge the same thing. Would that I might so follow and track out all my offences, that in none I need fear His piercing Eyes, in none be ashamed at the light of His candles! Now I am seen, but I see not. At hand is that Eye, to Whom all things are open, although Itself is not open. Once <sup>18</sup> I shall know, even as I am known. Now I know in part, but I am not known in part, but wholly."

The men that are settled on their lees, stiffened and contracted<sup>19</sup>. The image is from wine which becomes harsh, if allowed to remain upon the lees, unremoved. It is drawn out by Jeremiah<sup>20</sup>, Moab hath been at ease<sup>21</sup> from his youth, and he hath settled on his lees, and hath not been emptied from vessel to vessel, neither hath he gone into captivity; therefore his taste remained in him, and his scent is not changed. So they upon whom no changes come, fear not God<sup>22</sup>. The lees are the refuse of the wine, yet stored up (so the word<sup>23</sup> means) with it, and the wine rests, as it were, upon them. So do men of ease rest in things defiled and defiling, their riches or their pleasure, which they hoard up, on which they are bent, so that they <sup>24</sup> lift not their mind to things above, but, darkened with foulest desires, are hardened and stiffened in sin."

That say in their heart, not openly scoffing, perhaps thinking that they believe; but people do believe as they love. Their most inward belief, the belief of their heart and affections, what they wish, and the hidden spring of their actions, is, The Lord will not do good, neither will He do evil. They act as believing so, and by acting inure themselves to believe it. They think of God as far away, <sup>25</sup> Is not God in the height of heaven? And behold the height of the stars, how high they are! And thou sayest, How doth God know? Can He judge through the dark cloud? Thick clouds are a covering to Him, that He seeth not; and He walketh in the circuit of heaven. <sup>26</sup> The ungodly in the pride of his heart (thinketh); He will not enquire; all his devices (speak), There is no God. Strong are his ways at all times; on high are Thy judgements out of his sight. <sup>27</sup> They slay the widow and the stranger, and murder the fatherless, and they say, The Lord shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it. <sup>28</sup> Such things they did imagine and were deceived; for their own wickedness blinded them. As for the mysteries of God, they knew them not. <sup>29</sup> Faith without works is dead. Faith which acts not dies out, and there comes in its stead this other persuasion, that God will not repay. There are more Atheists than believe themselves to be such. These act as if there were no Judge of their deeds, and at last come, themselves to believe that God will not punish<sup>30</sup>. What else is the thought of all worldlings, of all who make idols to themselves of any pleasure or gain or ambition, but, "God will not punish?" "God cannot punish the [wrongful, selfish,] indulgence of the nature which He has made." "God will not be so precise." "God will not punish with everlasting severance from Him, the sins of this short life." And they see not that they ascribe to God, what He attributes to idols i. e., not-gods. <sup>1</sup> Do good or do evil, that we may be dismayed and behold it together. <sup>2</sup> Be not afraid of them; for they cannot do evil, neither also is it in them to do good. These think not that God does good; for they ascribe their success to their own diligence, wisdom, strength, and thank not God for it. They think not that He sends them evil. For they defy Him and His laws, and think that they shall go unpunished. What remains but that He should be as dumb an idol as those of the heathen?

14 'The great day of the LORD is near, it

13 Therefore their goods, lit. And their strength. It is the simple sequel in God's Providence. It is a continued narrative. God will visit those who say, that God does not interfere in man's affairs, and, it shall be seen <sup>3</sup> whose words shall stand, God's or their's. All which God had threatened in the law shall be fulfilled. God, in the fulfilment of the punishment, which He had foretold in the law <sup>4</sup>, would vindicate not only His present Providence, but His continual government of His own world. All which is strength to man, shall the rather fail, because it is strength, and they presume on it and it deceives them. Its one end is to become a prey of devils. Riches, learning, rule, influence, power, bodily strength, genius, eloquence, popular favour, shall all fail a man, and he, when stripped of them, shall be the more bared because he gathered them around him. <sup>5</sup> Wealth is ever a runaway and has no stability, but rather intoxicates and inclines to revolt and has unsteady feet. Exceeding folly is it to think much of it. For it will not rescue those lying under the Divine displeasure, nor will it free any from guilt, when God decreeth punishment, and bringeth the judgement befitting on the transgressors. How utterly useless this eagerness after wealth is to the ungodly, he teacheth, saying, that their strength shall be a prey to the Chaldean.

And their houses a desolation. <sup>6</sup> For they are, of whom it may be said very truly, This is the man that took not God for his strength, but trusted unto the multitude of his riches, and strengthened himself in his wickedness. But if indeed their houses are adorned costlily, they shall not be theirs, for they shall be burned, and themselves go into captivity, leaving all in their house, and deprived of all which would gladden. And this God said clearly to the king of Judah by Jeremiah, <sup>7</sup> Thou hast builded thyself a large house and wide chambers, cieled with cedar, and painted with vermilion. Shalt thou reign because thou closest thyself with cedar? <sup>8</sup> As the house of the body is the bodily dwelling, so to each mind its house is that, wherein through desire it is wont to dwell, and desolate shall they be, being severed for ever from the things they desired, and for ever deserted by God. They shall also build houses but not inhabit them, as the rich man said to his soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years.—Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee; then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? Before the siege by the Romans, Jerusalem and the temple had been greatly beautified, only to be destroyed. And they shall plant vineyards, but not drink the wine thereof. This is the woe, first pronounced in the law <sup>10</sup>, often repeated and ever found true. Wickedness makes joy its end, yet never finds it, seeking it where it is not, out of God.

14 The great Day of the Lord is near. The Prophet again expands the words of Joel, accumulating words expressive of the terrors of that Day, shewing that though <sup>11</sup> the great and very terrible Day of the Lord, a day (Joel had said <sup>12</sup>) of darkness and gloominess, of clouds and of thick darkness, which was then coming and nigh at hand <sup>13</sup>, had come and was gone, it was only a forerunner of others; none of them final; but each, because it was a judgement and an instance of the justice of God, an earnest and forerunner of other judgements to the end. Again, a great Day of the Lord was near. This Day had itself, so to speak, many hours and divisions of the day. But each hour tolled the same knell of approaching doom. Each calamity in the miserable reigns of the sons of Josiah was one stroke in the passing-bell, until the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, for the time closed it. The judgement was complete. The completeness of that excision made it the more an image of every other like day until the final destruction of all which, although around or near to Christ, shall in the Great Day be found not to be His, but to have rejected Him. <sup>14</sup> Truly was vengeance required, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zechariah, whom they slew between the temple and the Altar, and at last when they said of the Son of God, His blood be upon us and upon our children, they experienced a bitter day, because they had provoked the Lord to bitterness; a Day, appointed by the Lord, in which not the weak only but the mighty shall be bowed down, and wrath shall come upon them to the end. For often before they endured the wrath of the Lord, but that wrath was not to the uttermost. What need now to describe how great calamities they endured in both captivities, and how they who rejected the light of the Lord, walked in darkness and thick darkness, and they who would not hear the trumpet of the solemn feast-days, heard the shout of the enemy. But of the fenced cities and lofty corner-towers of Judæa, which are till now destroyed even to the ground, the eyes, I deem, can judge better than the ears. We especially, now living in that province, can see, can prove what is written. We scarcely discern slight traces of ruins of what once were great cities. At Shiloh, where was the tabernacle and ark of the testament of the Lord, scarcely the foundations of the altar are shewn. Rama and Bethoron and the other noble cities built by Solomon, are shewn to be little villages. Let us read Josephus and the prophecy of Zephaniah; we shall see his history before our eyes. And this must be said not only of the captivity, but even to the present day. The treacherous husbandmen, having slain the servants, and, at last, the Son of God, are prevented from entering Jerusalem, except to wail, and they purchase at a price leave to weep the ruin of their city, so that they who once bought the Blood of Christ, buy their tears; not even their tears are costless. You may see Deut. 28. 29.

Isai. 59. 10.

on the day that Jerusalem was taken and destroyed by the Romans, a people in mourning come, decrepit old women and old men, in aged and ragged wretchedness, shewing in their bodies and in their guise the wrath of the Lord. The hapless crowd is gathered, and amid the gleaming of the Cross of Christ, and the radiant glory of His Resurrection, the standard also of the Cross shining from Mount Olivet, you may see the people, piteous but unpitied, bewail the ruins of their temple, tears still on their cheeks, their arms livid and their hair dishevelled, and the soldier asketh a guerdon, that they may be allowed to weep longer. And doth any, when he seeth this, doubt of the day of trouble and distress, the day of darkness and gloominess, the day of clouds and thick darkness, the day of the trumpet and alarm? For they have also trumpets in their sorrow, and, according to the prophecy, the voice of the solemn feast-day is turned into mourning. They wail over the ashes of the Sanctuary and the altar destroyed, and over cities once fenced, and over the high towers of the temple, from which they once cast headlong James the brother of the Lord.<sup>1</sup>

But referring the Day of the Lord to the end of the world or the close of the life of each, it too is near; near, the prophet adds to impress the more its nearness; for it is at hand to each; and when eternity shall come, all time shall seem like a moment, <sup>1</sup>A thousand years, when past, are like a watch in the night; one fourth part of one night.

And hasteth greatly. For time whirls on more rapidly to each, year by year, and when God's judgements draw near, the tokens of them thicken, and troubles sweep one over the other, events jostle against each other. The voice of the day of the Lord. That Day, when it cometh, shall leave no one in doubt what it meaneth; it shall give no uncertain sound, but shall, trumpet-tongued, proclaim the holiness and justice of Almighty God; its voice shall be the Voice of Christ, which <sup>2</sup>all that are in the graves shall hear and come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation.

The mighty men shall cry there bitterly; for <sup>3</sup>bitter is the remembrance of death to a man that liveth at rest in his possessions, unto the man that hath nothing to vex him, and that hath prosperity in all things; and <sup>4</sup>There is no mighty man that hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit; neither hath he power in the day of death; and there is no discharge in that war; neither shall wickedness deliver those that are given to it. Rather, wrath shall come upon <sup>5</sup>the kings of the earth, and the great men and the rich men and the mighty men, and they shall will to hide themselves from the Face of Him that sitteth on the Throne and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great Day of His wrath is come: and who shall be able to stand?

The mighty men shall cry there bitterly. The prophet has spoken of time, the day of the Lord. He points out the more vividly the unseen sight and place, there; so David says, <sup>6</sup>There they feared a fear. He sees the place; he hears the bitter cry. So nigh is it in fact; so close the connection of cause and effect, of sin and punishment. There shall be a great and bitter cry, when there shall be no place for repentance. It shall be a <sup>7</sup>mighty cry, but mighty in the bitterness of its distress. <sup>8</sup>Mighty men shall be mightily tormented, i. e., those who have been mighty against God, weak against Satan, and shall have used their might in his service.

15. A day of wrath, in which all the wrath of Almighty God, which evil angels and evil men have treasured to them for that day, shall be poured out: the day of wrath, because then they shall be brought face to face before the Presence of God, but thenceforth they shall be cast out of it for ever.

A day of trouble and distress. Both words express, how anguish shall narrow and hem them in; so that there shall be no escape; above them, God displeased; below, the flames of Hell; around, devils to drag them away, and Angels casting them forth in bundles to burn them; without, the books which shall be opened; and within, conscience leaving them no escape.

A day of wasteness and desolation, in which all things shall return to their primeval void, before the Spirit of God brooded upon the face of the waters, His Presence being altogether withdrawn.

A day of darkness and gloominess; for sun and moon shall lose their brightness, and no brightness from the Lamb shall shine upon the wicked, but they shall be driven into outer darkness.

A day of clouds and thick darkness, hiding from them the Face of the Sun of Righteousness, and covering Him, so that their prayers should not pass through.<sup>9</sup>

16. A day of the trumpet and alarm<sup>10</sup>, i. e., of the loud blast of the trumpet, which sounds alarm and causes it. The word<sup>11</sup> is especially the shrill loud noise of the trumpet (for sacred purposes in Israel itself, as ruling all the movements of the tabernacle and accompanying their feasts); then also of the "battle cry." They had not listened to the voice of the trumpet, as it called them to holy service; now they shall hear<sup>12</sup> the voice of the Archangel and the trump of God.

Against the high towers, lit. corners<sup>13</sup>, and so corner-towers. This peculiarity describes Jerusalem, whose walls <sup>14</sup>were made artificially standing in a line curved inwards, so that the flanks of assailants might be exposed." By this same name<sup>15</sup> are called the mighty men and chiefs of the people, who, humanly speaking, hold it together and support it; on these chiefs in rebellion against God, whether devils or evil men, shall punishment greatly fall.

17. I will bring distress upon men. I will hem them in,

of a house, of a street, of a court, a city. Hence "the gate of the corner," 2 Kgs xiv. 13, 2 Chr. xxvi. 9, Jer. xxxi. 38. In 2 Chr. xxvi. 16, mo cannot be "battlements" (as Ges. &c.), since the engines were erected upon them. in anguish on all sides. God Himself shall meet them with His terrors, wherever they turn. <sup>1</sup> I will hem them in, that they may find it so.

That they shall walk like blind men, utterly bereft of counsel, seeing no more than the blind which way to turn, grasping blindly and frantically at anything, and going on headlong to their own destruction. So God forewarned them in the law; <sup>2</sup> Thou shalt grope at noon day, as the blind gropeth in darkness; and Job, of the wicked generally, <sup>3</sup> They meet with the darkness in the day-time, and grope in the noon-day as in the night; and, <sup>4</sup> They grope in the dark without light, and He maketh them to stagger like a drunken man; and Isaiah foretelling of those times, <sup>5</sup> We grope for the wall, as the blind; and we grope, as if we had no eyes; we stumble in the noon-day as in the night. Because they have sinned against the Lord, and so He hath turned their wisdom into foolishness, and since they have despised Him, He hath made them objects of contempt. <sup>6</sup> Their blood shall be poured out like dust, as abundant and as valueless; utterly disregarded by Him, as Asaph complains, <sup>7</sup> their blood have they shed like water; contemptible and disgusting as what is vilest; their flesh <sup>8</sup> as the dung, refuse, decayed, putrefied, offensive, enriching by its decay the land, which had been the scene of their luxuries and oppressions. Yet the most offensive disgusting physical corruption is but a faint image of the defilement of sin. This punishment, in which the carrion-remains should be entombed only in the bowels of vultures and dogs, was especially threatened to Jehoiakim; <sup>9</sup> He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, dragged and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.

18. Neither their silver nor their gold shall be able to deliver them in the day of the Lord's wrath. Gain unjustly gotten was the cause of their destruction. For, as Ezekiel closes the like description; <sup>10</sup> They shall cast their silver into the streets, and their gold shall be removed; their silver and their gold shall not be able to deliver them in the day of the wrath of the Lord; they shall not satisfy their souls nor fill their bowels: because it is the stumbling block of their iniquity. Much less shall any possession, outward or inward, be of avail in the Great Day; since in death the rich man's <sup>11</sup> pomp shall not follow him, and every gift which he has misused, whether of mind or spirit, even the knowledge of God without doing His Will, shall but increase damnation. "Sinners will then have nothing but their sins."

Here the prophet uses images belonging more to the immediate destruction; at the close the words again widen, and belong, in their fullest literal sense, to the Day of Judgement. The whole land, rather, as at the beginning, the whole earth shall be devoured by the fire of His jealousy; for He shall make even a speedy riddance of all them that dwell in the land: rather, He shall make an utter, yea altogether <sup>12</sup> a terrific destruction <sup>13</sup> of all the dwellers of the earth. What Nahum had foretold of Nineveh <sup>14</sup>, He shall make the place thereof an utter consumption, that Zephaniah fore-tells of all the inhabitants of the world. For what is this, the whole earth shall be devoured by the fire of His jealousy, but what S. Peter says, <sup>15</sup> the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up? And what is that he says, He shall make all the dwellers of the earth an utter, yea altogether a hasty destruction, but a general judgement of all, who belong to the world, whose home, citizenship, whose whole mind is in the world, not as true Christians, who are strangers and pilgrims here, and their <sup>16</sup> citizenship is in Heaven? These God shall make an utter, terrific, speedy destruction, a living death, so that they shall at once both be and not be; bc, as continued in being; not be, as having no life of God, but only a continued death in misery. And this shall be through the jealousy of Almighty God, that Divine quality in Him, whereby He loves and wills to be loved, and endures not those who give to others the love for which He gave so much and which is so wholly due to Himself Alone. <sup>17</sup> Thou demandest my love, and if I give it not, art wroth with me, and threatenest me with grievous woes. Is it then a slight woe to love Thee not? What will be that anger, which is Infinite Love, but which becomes, through man's sin, Hate?

II. Having set forth the terrors of the Judgement Day, the prophet adds an earnest call to repentance; and then declares how judgements, forerunners of that Day, shall fall, one by one, on those nations around, who know not God, and shall rest upon Nineveh, the great beautiful ancient city of the world. <sup>18</sup> See the mercy of God. It had been enough to have set before the wise the vehemence of the coming evil. But because He willeth not to punish, but to alarm only, Himself calleth to repentance, that He may not do what He threatened." <sup>19</sup> Having set forth clearly the savageness of the war and the greatness of the suffering to come, he suitably turns his discourse to the duty of calling to repentance, when it was easy to persuade them, being terrified. For sometimes when the mind has been numbed, and exceedingly bent to evil, we do not readily admit even the will to repent, but fear often drives us to it, even against our will. He calls us then to friendship with Himself. For as they revolted, became aliens, serving idols and giving up their mind to their passions, so they would, as it were, retrace their steps, and lay hold of the friendship of God, choosing to serve Him, nay and Him Alone, and obey His commandments. Wherefore while we have time, while the Lord, in His forbearance as God, gives way, let us enact repentance, supplicate, say weeping, <sup>20</sup> remember not the sins and offences of my youth; let us unite ourselves with Him by sanctification and sobriety. So shall we be sheltered in the day of wrath, and wash away the stain of our falls, before the Day of the Lord come upon us. For the Judge will come, He will come from heaven at the due season, and will reward each according to his work."

CHAPTER II.

1 An exhortation to repentance. 4 The judgment of the Philistines, 8 of Moab and Ammon, 12 of Ethiopia and Assyria.

1. Gather yourselves together, yea gather together<sup>1</sup>, rather, Sift yourselves, yea sift<sup>2</sup>. The exact image is from gathering stubble or dry sticks, which are picked up one by one, with search and care. So must men deal with the dry and withered leaves of a past evil life. The English rendering however comes to the same meaning. We use, "collect one's self" for bringing one's self, all one's thoughts, together, and so, having full possession of one's self. Or gathering ourselves might stand in contrast with being "abroad," as it were, out of ourselves amid the manifoldness of things seen. "Thou who, taken up with the business of the world, hurriest to and fro amid divers things, return to the Church of the saints, and join thyself to their life and assembly, whom thou seest to please God, and bring together the dislocated members of thy soul, which now are not knit together, into one frame of wisdom, and cleave to its embrace." Gather yourselves into one, wherein ye have been scattered; to the One God, from Whom they had wandered, seeking pleasure from His many creatures; to His one fold and Church, from which they had severed themselves outwardly by joining the worship of Baal, inwardly, by serving him and his abominable rites; joining and joined to the assembly of the faithful, by oneness of faith and life.

In order to repent, a man must know himself thoroughly; and this can only be done by taking act by act, word by word, thought by thought, as far as he can, not in a confused heap or mass, as they lie in any man's conscience, but one by one, each picked up apart, and examined, and added to the scar unfruitful heap, plucking them as it were, and gathering them out of himself, that so they may, by the Spirit of burning, the fire of God's Spirit kindling repentance, be burned up, and not the sinner himself be fuel for fire with them. The word too is intensive, "Gather together all which is in you, thoroughly, piece by piece" (for the sinner's whole self becomes chaff, dry and empty). To use another image, "Sift yourselves thoroughly, so that nothing escape, as far as your diligence can reach, and then—And gather on, i. e., "glean on;" examine yourselves, "not lightly and after the manner of dissemblers before God," but repeatedly, gleaning again and again, to see if by any means any thing have escaped: continuing on the search and ceasing not. The first earnest search into the soul must be the beginning, not the end. Our search must be continued, until there be no more to be discovered, i. e. when sin is no more, and we see ourselves in the full light of the Presence of our Judge. For a first search, however diligent, never thoroughly reaches the whole deep disease of the whole man; the most grievous sins hide other grievous sins, though lighter. Some sins flash on the conscience, at one time, some at another; so that few, even upon a diligent search, come at once to the knowledge of all their heaviest sins. When the mist is less thick, we see more clearly what was before one dark dull mass of imperfection and misery. "Spiritual sins are also with difficulty sifted, (as they are,) by one who is carnal. Whence it happens, that things in themselves heavier he perceives less or very little, and conscience is not grieved so much by the memory of pride or envy, as of impurities and crimes." So having said, "Sift yourselves through and through," he says, "sift on." A diligent sifting and search into himself must be the beginning of all true repentance and pardon. "What remains, but that we give ourselves wholly to this work, so holy, and needful? Let us search and try our ways and our doings, and let each think that he has made progress, not if he find not what to blame, but if he blame what he finds. Thou hast not sifted thyself in vain, if thou hast discovered that thou needest a fresh sifting; and so often has thy search not failed thee, as thou judgest that it must be renewed. But if thou ever dost this, when there is need, thou dost it ever. But ever remember that thou needest help from above and the mercy of Jesus Christ our Lord Who is over all, God blessed for ever." The whole course of self-examination then lies in two words of Divine Scripture. And withal he warns them, instead of gathering together riches which shall not be able to deliver them in the day of trouble, to gather themselves into themselves, and so judge themselves thoroughly<sup>7</sup>, that they be not judged of the Lord<sup>8</sup>.

<sup>2</sup> The word is first used of gathering dry stubble together (Ex. v. 7, 12.) then of "dry sticks" one by one (Nu. xv. 32, 33, 1 Kgs xvii. 10, 12.). A heathen speaks of "gathering out thorns" (ἀξαράειν) i. e., minutely examining and bringing out to light every fault. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 6. 2.) And another writes to his steward, "Shalt thou with stronger hand pull out thorns from my field, or I from my mind?" Hor. Ep. i. 14.4.

<sup>3</sup> S. Jer. <sup>4</sup> S. Bern. de Cons. c. 5. <sup>5</sup> Id. Serm. 58. in Cant. fin. <sup>6</sup> Lam. iii. 40. The two words, search and try, ἔραυν are both used of a deep search of a thing which lies deep and hidden. Both originally mean "dig." Both are used of a Divine knowledge of the inmost soul; the former of the mind as enlightened by God (Prov. xx. 27), the latter of God's searching it out Himself (Jer. xvii. 10. Ps. xlv. 23 (21)

O nation not desired<sup>9</sup>, i. e., having nothing in itself to be desired or loved, but rather, for its sin, hateful to God. God yearneth with pity and compassion over His creatures; He <sup>hath a desire to the work of His Hands</sup>. Here Israel is spoken to, as what he had made himself, hateful to God by his sins, although still an object of His tender care, in what yet remained to him of nature or grace which was from Himself.

2. Before the decree bring forth. God's word is full (as it were) of the event which it foretelleth; it contains its own fulfilment in itself, and travaileth until it come to pass, giving signs of its coming, yet delaying until the full time. Time

<sup>9</sup> The E. M. has "or not desirous," the word רָצוּ signifying to long, Gen. xxxi. 80. Ps. lxxxiv. 3. But in both places the object of desire is mentioned, "thy father's house," in Gen., "the courts of the Lord," in the Ps. Israel had strong but bad longings. "Not desirous" would not by itself convey, "having no desire to return to God," or as Ch., "who willeth not to return to the law." The same objection lies, over and above, to the rendering "unashamed," coll. Chald. רָצוּ "turned pale" from shame, disgrace, horror. Buxt. For there is nothing to limit the "turning pale" to "shame." The root רָצוּ in Heb. only means "longed," Pa. xvii. 12, Job xiv. 16, of which רָצוּ is here the passive. People turn pale from fear or horror, not from shame.

is said to bring forth what is wrought in it. Thou knowest not, what a day shall bring forth.

Before the day pass as the chaff, or, parenthetically, like chaff the day passeth by. God's counsels lie wrapt up, as it were, in the womb of time, wherein He hides them, until the moment which He has appointed, and they break forth suddenly to those who look not for them. The mean season is given for repentance, i. e., the day of grace, the span of repentance still allowed, which is continually whirling more swiftly by; and woe, if it be fruitless as chaff! Those who profit not by it shall also be as chaff, carried away pitilessly by the whirlwind to destruction. Time, on which eternity hangs, is a slight, uncertain thing, as little to be counted upon, as the light dry particles which are the sport of the wind, driven uncertainly hither and thither. But when it is passed, then cometh, not to them, but upon them, from Heaven, overwhelming them, <sup>1</sup> abiding upon them, not to pass away, the heat of the anger of Almighty God. This warning he twice repeats, to impress the certainty and speed of its coming<sup>2</sup>. It is the warning of our Lord, <sup>3</sup> Take heed, lest that day come upon you unawares.

3. Seek ye the Lord. He had exhorted sinners to penitence; he now calls the righteous to persevere and increase more and more. He bids them seek diligently<sup>4</sup>, and that with a three-fold call, to seek Him from Whom they received daily the three-fold blessing<sup>5</sup>, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as he had just before threatened God's impending judgement with the same use of the mysterious number, three. They, whom he calls, were already, by the grace of God, meek, and had wrought His judgement. <sup>6</sup> Submitting themselves to the word of God, they had done and were doing the judgement of God, judging themselves that they be not judged; the beginning of which judgement is, as sinners and guilty of death, to give themselves to the Cross of the Lord, i. e., to be <sup>7</sup> baptised in His Death and be buried with Him by Baptism into death; but the perfection of that judgement or righteousness is, to walk in newness of life, as He rose from the dead through the glory of the Father.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>9</sup> Since the meek already have God through grace as the Possessor and Dweller in their heart, how shall they seek Him but that they may have Him more fully and more perfectly, knowing Him more clearly, loving Him more ardently, cleaving to Him more inseparably, that so they may be heard by Him, not for themselves only, but for others?<sup>10</sup> It is then the same Voice as at the close of the Revelation, <sup>9</sup> the righteous, let him be still more righteous; the holy, let him be still more holy. They are the meek, who are exhorted diligently to seek meekness, and they who had wrought His judgement, who are diligently to seek Righteousness. And since our Lord saith, <sup>10</sup> Learn of Me, for I am meek and lowly of heart, He bids <sup>11</sup> those who imitated His meekness and did His judgement, to seek the Lord in their meekness.<sup>12</sup> Meekness and Righteousness may be His Attributes, Who is All-gentleness and All-Righteousness, the Fountain of all, wheresoever it is, in gentleness receiving penitents, and, as the Righteous Judge, giving the crown of righteousness to those who love Him and keep His commandments, yea He joineth righteousness with meekness, since without His mercy no man living could be justified in His Sight. <sup>13</sup> God is sought by us, when, of our choice, laying aside all listlessness, we thirst after doing what pleases Him; and we shall do judgement too, when we fulfil His Divine law, working out what is good unshrinkingly; and we shall gain the prize of righteousness, when crowned with glory for well-doing and running the well-reported and blameless way of true piety to God and of love to the brethren; for <sup>13</sup> love is the fulfilling of the law.<sup>14</sup>

It may be ye shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger. <sup>15</sup> Shall these too then scarcely be hid in the day of the Lord's anger? Doth not the Apostle Peter say the very same? <sup>14</sup> If it first begin at us, what shall be the end of them that obey not the Gospel of God? And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? So then, although any be meek, although he have wrought the judgement of the Lord, let him ever suspect himself, nor think that he has already attained, since neither can any righteous be saved, if he be judged without mercy.<sup>15</sup> <sup>16</sup> He saith, it may be; not that there is any doubt that the meek and they who perseveringly seek God, shall then be saved, but to convey how difficult it is to be saved, and how fearful and rigorous is the judgement of God.<sup>16</sup> To be hid is to be sheltered from wrath under the protection of God; as David says, <sup>16</sup> In the time of trouble He shall hide me; and, <sup>17</sup> Thou shalt hide them [that trust in Thee] in the secret of Thy presence from the pride of man; Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues. And in Isaiah, <sup>17</sup> A Man shall be as an hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; and, <sup>18</sup> There shall be a tabernacle for a shadow in the daytime from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and from rain.

4. For. As a ground for repentance and perseverance, he goes through Heathen nations, upon whom God's wrath should come. <sup>11</sup> As Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, after visions concerning Judah, turn to other nations round about, and according to the character of each, announce what shall come upon them, and dwell at length upon it, so doth this prophet, though more briefly. And thus under five nations, who lay West, East, South and North, he includes all mankind on all sides, and, again, according to their respective characters towards Israel, as they are alien from, or hostile to the Church; the Philistines<sup>19</sup>, as a near, malicious, infesting enemy; Moab and Ammon<sup>20</sup>, people akin to her (as heretics) yet ever rejoicing at her troubles and sufferings; Ethiopians<sup>21</sup>, distant nations at peace with her, and which are, for the most part, spoken of as to be brought unto her; Assyria<sup>22</sup>, as the great oppressive power of the world, and so upon it the full desolation rests. In the first fulfilment, because Moab and Ammon aiding Nebuchadnezzar, (and all, in divers ways, wronging God's people<sup>23</sup>), trampled on His sanctuary, overthrew His temple and blasphemed the Lord, the prophecy is turned against them. So then, before the captivity came, while Josiah was yet king, and Jerusalem and the temple were, as yet, not overthrown, the prophecy is directed against those who mocked at them. Gaza shall be forsaken. Out of the five cities of the Philistines, the Prophet pronounces woe upon the same four as Amos<sup>1</sup> before, Jeremiah<sup>2</sup> soon after, and Zechariah<sup>3</sup> later. Gath, then, the fifth, had probably remained with Judah since Uziah<sup>4</sup> and Hezekiah<sup>5</sup>. In the sentence of the rest, regard is had (as is so frequent in the Old Testament) to the names of the places themselves, that, henceforth, the name of the place might suggest the thought of the doom pronounced upon it. The names expressed boastfulness, and so, in the Divine judgement, carried their own sentence with them, and this sentence is pronounced by a slight change in the word. Thus 'Azzah (Gaza,) strong shall be 'Azoobah, desolated; Ekron, deep-rooting<sup>6</sup>, shall Teaker, be uprooted; the Cherethites (cutters off) shall become (Cheroth) diggings; Chebel, the band of the sea coast, shall be in another sense Chebel, an inheritance<sup>7</sup>, divided by line to the remnant of Judah; and Ashdod (the waster<sup>8</sup>) shall be taken in their might, not by craft, nor in the way of robbers, but driven forth violently and openly in the noon-day.

For Gaza shall be forsaken. Some vicissitudes of these towns have been noted already<sup>9</sup>. The fulfilment of the prophecy is not tied down to time; the one marked contrast is, that the old heathen enemies of Judah should be destroyed, the house of Judah should be restored, and should re-enter upon the possession of the land, promised to them of old. The Philistine towns had, it seems, nothing to fear from Babylon or Persia, to whom they remained faithful subjects. The Ashdodites (who probably, as the most important, stand for the whole<sup>10</sup>) combined with Sanballat, the Ammonites and the Arabians<sup>11</sup>, to hinder the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem. Even an army was gathered, headed by Samaria<sup>12</sup>. They gave themselves out as loyal, Jerusalem as rebellious<sup>13</sup>. The old sin remaining, Zechariah renewed the sentence by Zephaniah against the four cities<sup>14</sup>; a prophecy, which an unbeliever also has recognised as picturing the march of Alexander<sup>15</sup>. "All the other cities of Palestine having submitted," Gaza alone resisted the conqueror for two or five months. It had come into the hands of the Persians in the expedition of Cambyses against Egypt<sup>17</sup>. The Gazæans having all perished fighting at their posts, Alexander sold the women and children, and re-peopled the city from the neighbourhood<sup>18</sup>. Palestine lay between the two rival successors of Alexander, the Ptolemies and Seleucidæ, and felt their wars<sup>19</sup>. Gaza fell through mischance into the hands of Ptolemy<sup>20</sup>, 11 years after the death of Alexander<sup>21</sup>, and soon after, was destroyed by Antiochus<sup>16</sup> (B.C. 198), "preserving its faith to Ptolemy" as before to the Persians, in a way admired by a heathen historian. In the Maccabæe wars, Judas Maccabæus chiefly destroyed the idols of Ashdod, but also<sup>22</sup> spoiled their cities; Jonathan set it on fire, with its idol-temple, which was a sort of citadel to it<sup>23</sup>; Ascalon submitted to him<sup>24</sup>; Ekron with its borders were given to him by Alexander Balas<sup>25</sup>; he burnt the suburbs of Gaza<sup>26</sup>; Simon took it, expelled its inhabitants, filled it with believing Jews and fortified it more strongly than before<sup>27</sup>; but, after a year's siege, it was betrayed to Alexander Jannæus, who slew its senate of 500 and razed the city to the ground<sup>28</sup>. Gabinius restored it and Ashdod<sup>29</sup>. After Herod's death, Ashdod was given to Salome<sup>30</sup>; Gaza, as being a Greek city<sup>31</sup>, was detached from the realm of Archelaus and annexed to Syria. It was destroyed by the Jews in their revolt when Florus was "procurator," A.D. 55<sup>32</sup>. Ascalon and Gaza must still have been strong, and were probably a distinct population in the early times of Antipater, father of Herod, when Alexander and Alexandra set him over all Idumæa, since "he is said" then "to have made friendship with the Arabs, Gazites and Ascalonites, likeminded with himself, and to have attached them by many and large presents."

Yet though the inhabitants were changed, the hereditary hatred remained. Philo in his Embassy to Caius, A.D. 40, used the strong language, "The Ascalonites have an implacable and irreconcilable enmity to the Jews, their neighbours, who inhabit the holy land." This continued toward Christians. Some horrible atrocities, of almost inconceivable savagery, by those of Gaza and Ascalon A.D. 361, are related by Theodoret<sup>35</sup> and Sozomen<sup>36</sup>. "Who is ignorant of the madness of the Gazæans?" asks S. Gregory of Nazianzus, of the times of Julian. This was previous to the conversion of the great Gazite temple of Marna into a Christian Church by Eudoxia<sup>38</sup>. On occasion of Constantine's exemption of the Maiumas Gazæ from their control, it is alleged, that they were "extreme Heathen." In the time of the Crusades the Ascalonites are described by Christians as their "most savage enemies."

It may be, that a likeness of sin may have continued on a likeness of punishment. But the primary prediction was against the people, not against the walls. The sentence, Gaza shall be forsaken, would have been fulfilled by the removal or captivity of its inhabitants, even if they had not been replaced by others. A prediction against any ancient British town would have been fulfilled, if the Britons in it had been replaced or exterminated by Danes, and these by Saxons, and these subdued by the Normans, though their displacers became wealthy and powerful in their place. Even on the same site it would not be the same Gaza, when the Philistine Gaza became Edomite, and the Edomite Greek, and the Greek Arabian<sup>41</sup>. Ashdod (as well as Gaza) is spoken of as a city of the Greeks<sup>42</sup>; New Gaza is spoken of as a mixture of Turks, Arabians, Fellahs, Bedouins out of Egypt, Syria, Petraea<sup>43</sup>. Felix Faber says, "there is a wonderful commixture of divers nations in it, Ethiopians, Arabs, <sup>6</sup> It seems to me most probable that the origin of the meanings is preserved in the Ch. ꠔꠔ, "root," (which itself is the source of other metaphoric meanings, as, "the root of a thing;" "the root" i. e., the foundation "of faith," its fundamental doctrines; "the root," in Lexicography, see Buxtorf) and that the Chald. ꠔꠔ "pluck up, remove," and ꠔꠔ, here and Eccl. iii. 2, is a denominative. The Proper Name is older probably than even Moses.

<sup>8</sup> The root ꠔꠔ has throughout, the meaning of "wasting," not of "strength." ꠔꠔ "the Almighty," is probably from a kindred root, ꠔꠔ.

See on Amos i. 6-8, p. 161-163.

Egyptians, Syrians, Indians and eastern Christians; no Latins<sup>1</sup>. Its Jewish inhabitants fled from it in the time of Napoleon: now, with few exceptions it is inhabited by Arabs<sup>2</sup>.

But these, Ghüzzeh, Eskalon, Akir, Sedud, are at most successors of the Philistine cities, of which there is no trace above the surface of the earth. It is common to speak of "remnants of antiquity," as being or not being to be found in any of them; but this means, that, where these exist, there are remains of a Greek or Roman, not of a Philistine city.

Of the four cities, Akkaron, Ekron, ("the firm-rooting") has not left a vestige. It is mentioned by name only, after the times of the Bible, by some who passed by it<sup>3</sup>. There was "a large village of Jews" so called in the time of Eusebius and S. Jerome<sup>4</sup>, "between Azotus and Jamnia." Now a village of "about 50 mud houses without a single remnant of antiquity except 2 large finely built wells" bears the name of Akir. S. Jerome adds, "Some think that Accaron is the tower of Strato, afterwards called Cæsarea." This was perhaps derived from misunderstanding his Jewish instructor<sup>5</sup>. But it shews how entirely all knowledge of Ekron was then lost.

Ashdod or Azotus which, at the time when Zephaniah prophesied, held out a twenty-nine years' siege against Psammetichus, is replaced by "a moderate sized village of mud houses, situated on the Eastern declivity of a little flattish hill," "entirely modern, not containing a vestige of antiquity." "A beautiful sculptured sarcophagus with some fragments of small marble shafts," "near the Khan on the S. W." belong of course to later times. "The whole south side of the hill appears also, as if it had been once covered with buildings, the stones of which are now thrown together in the rude fences." Its Bishops are mentioned from the Council of Nice to A.D. 536<sup>6</sup>, and so probably continued till the Mohammedan devastation. It is not mentioned in the Talmud<sup>7</sup>. Benjamin of Tudela calls it Palmis, and says, "it is desolate, and there are no Jews in it"<sup>8</sup>. "Neither Ibn Haukal [Yacut], Edrisi, Abulfeda, nor William of Tyre mention it."

Ascalon and Gaza had each a port, Maiuma Gazæ, Maiuma Ascalon; lit. "a place on the sea" (an Egyptian name<sup>12</sup>) belonging to Ascalon or Gaza. The name involves that Ascalon and Gaza themselves, the old Philistine towns, were not on the sea. They were, like Athens, built inland, perhaps (as has been conjectured) from fear of the raids of pirates, or of inroads from those who (like the Philistines themselves probably, or some tribe of them) might come from the sea. The port probably of both was built in much later times; the Egyptian name implies that they were built by Egyptians, after the time when its kings Necos and Apries, (Pharaoh-Necho and Pharaoh-Hophra, who took Gaza<sup>13</sup>) made Egypt a naval power<sup>14</sup>. This became a characteristic of these Philistine cities. They themselves lay more or less inland, and had a city connected with them, of the same name, on the shore. Thus there was an "Azotus by the sea," and an "Azotus Ispinus." There were "two Iamniæ, one inland." But Ashdod lay further from the sea than Gaza; Yamnia, (the Yabneel of Joshua<sup>17</sup>, in Uziah's time, Yabneh<sup>18</sup>) further than Ashdod. The port of Yamnia was burnt by Judas<sup>19</sup>.

The name, Maiumas, does not appear till Christian times, though "the port of Gaza" is mentioned by Strabo<sup>20</sup>: to it, Alexander brought from Tyre the machines, with which he took Gaza itself<sup>21</sup>. That port then must have been at some distance from Gaza. Each port became a town, large enough to have, in Christian times, a Bishop of its own. The Epistle of John of Jerusalem, inserted in the Acts of the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 536, written in the name of Palestine i., ii., and iii., is signed by a Bishop of Maiumen of Ascalon, as well as by a Bishop of Ascalon, as it is by a Bishop of Maiumas of Gaza as well as by a Bishop of Gaza<sup>22</sup>. Yabne, or Yamnia, was on a small eminence<sup>23</sup>, 6½ hours from the sea<sup>24</sup>. The Maiumas Gazæ became the more known. To it, as being Christian, Constantine gave the right of citizenship, and called it Constantia from his son, making it a city independent of Gaza. Julian the Apostate gave to Gaza (which, though it had Bishops and Martyrs, had a heathen temple at the beginning of the 5th century) its former jurisdiction over it, and though about 20 furlongs off, it was called "the maritime portion of Gaza"<sup>25</sup>. It had thenceforth the same municipal officers; but, "as regards the Church alone," Sozomen adds, "they still appear to be two cities; each has its own Bishop and clergy, and festivals and martyrs, and commemorations of those who had been their Bishops, and boundaries of the fields around, whereby the altars which belong to each Episcopate are parted." The provincial Synod decided against the desire of a Bishop of Gaza, in Sozomen's time, who wished to bring the Clergy of the Maiumites under himself, ruling that "although deprived of their civil privileges by a heathen king, they should not be deprived of those of the Church."

In A.D. 400, then, the two cities were distinct, not joined or running into one another.

S. Jerome mentions it as "Maiumas, the emporium of Gaza, 7 miles from the desert on the way to Egypt by the sea;" Sozomen speaks of "Gaza by the sea, which they also call Maiumas;" Evagrius, "that which they also call Maiumas, which is over against the city Gaza," "a little city." Mark the deacon A.D. 421, says, "We sailed to the maritime portion of Gaza, which they call Maiumas," and Antoninus Martyr, about the close of the 4th century, "we came from Ascalon to Mazomates, and came thence, after a mile, to Gaza,—that magnificent and lovely city." This perhaps explains how an anonymous Geographer, enumerating the places from Egypt to Tyre, says so distinctly, "after Rinocorura lies the new Gaza, being itself also a city; then the desert Gaza," (writing, we must suppose, after some of the destructions of Gaza); and S. Jerome could say positively; "The site of the ancient city scarce yields the traces of foundations; but the city now seen was built in another place in lieu of that which fell."

"At seven furlongs from the sea the manifold but minute remains of an ancient city are yet in many places to be found—Innumerable fragments of broken pottery, pieces of glass, (some beautifully stained) and of polished marble, lie thickly spread in every level and hollow, at a considerable elevation and various distances, on a space of several square miles. In fifty different places they profusely lie, in a level space far firmer than the surrounding sands," "from small patches to more open spaces of twelve or twenty thousand square yards." "The oblong sand-hill, greatly varied in its elevation and of an undulated surface, throughout which they recur, extends to the W. and W. S. W. from the sea nearly to the environs of the modern Gaza." "In attempts to cultivate the sand (in 1832) hewn stones were found, near the old port. Remains of an old wall reached to the sea.—Ten large fragments of wall were embedded in the sand. About 2 miles off are fragments of another wall. Four intermediate fountains still exist, nearly entire in a line along the coast, doubtless pertaining to the ancient port of Gaza. For a short distance inland, the débris is less frequent, as if marking the space between it and the ancient city, but it again becomes plentiful in every hollow. About half a mile from the sea we saw three pedestals of beautiful marble. Holes are still to be seen from which hewn stones had been taken."

On the other hand, since the old Ashkelon had, like Gaza, Jamnia, Ashdod, a sea-port town belonging to it but distinct from itself, (the city itself lying distinct and inland), and since there is no space for two towns distinct from one another, within the circuit of the Ashkelon of the crusades, which is limited by the nature of the ground, there seems to be no choice but that the city of the crusades, and the present skeleton, should have been the Maiumas Ascalon, the sea-port. The change might the more readily take place, since the title "port" was often omitted. The new town obliterated the memory of the old, as Neapolis, Naples, on the shore, has taken place of the inland city (whatever its name was), or Utrecht, it is said, has displaced the old Roman town, the remains of which are three miles off at Vechten<sup>3</sup>, or Sichem is called Neapolis, Nablous, which yet was 3 miles off<sup>4</sup>. Er-riha is, probably, at least the second representative of the ancient Jericho; the Jericho of the New Testament, built by Herod, not being the Jericho of the prophets. The Coreyra of Greek history gave its name to the island; it is replaced by a Corfu in a different but near locality, which equally gives its name to the island now. The name of Ve-netia migrated with the inhabitants of the province, who fled from Attila, some 23 miles, to a few of the islands on the coast, to become again the name of a great republic<sup>5</sup>. In our own country, "old Windsor" is said to have been the residence of the Saxon monarchs; the present Windsor, was originally "new Windsor:" old Sarum was the Cathedral city, until the reign of Henry iii: but, as the old towns decayed, the new towns came to be called Windsor, Sarum, though not the towns which first had the name. What is now called Shoreham, not many years ago, was called "new Shoreham," in distinction from the neighbouring village<sup>6</sup>.

William of Tyre describes Ashkelon as "situated on the sea-shore, in the form of a semi-circle, whose chord or diameter lies on the sea-shore; but its circumference or arc on the land, looking East. The whole city lies as in a trench, all declining towards the sea, surrounded on all sides by raised mounds, on which are walls with numerous towers of solid masonry, the cement being harder than the stone, with walls of due thickness and of height proportionate: it is surmounted also with outer walls of the same solidity." He then describes its four gates, E. N. S. towards Jerusalem, Gaza, Joppa, and the W., called the sea-gate, because "by it the inhabitants have an egress to the sea."

A modern traveller, whose description of the ruins exactly agrees with this, says, "the walls are built on a ridge of rocks that winds round the town in a semicircular direction and terminates at each end in the sea: the ground falls within the walls in the same manner, that it does without, so that no part of it could be seen from the outside of the walls. There is no bay nor shelter for shipping, but a small harbour advancing a little way into the town towards its eastern extremity seems to have been formed for the accommodation of such small craft as were used in the better days of the city." The harbour, moreover, was larger during the crusades, and enabled Ascalon to receive supplies of corn from Egypt and thereby to protract its siege. Sultan Bibars filled up the port and cast stones into the sea, A.D. 1270, and destroyed the remains of the fortifications, for fear that the Franks, after their treaty with the king of Tunis, should bring back their forces against Islamism and establish themselves there<sup>7</sup>. Yet Abulfeda, who wrote a few years later, calls it "one of the Syrian ports of Islam"<sup>8</sup>.

This city, so placed on the sea, and in which too the sea enters, cannot be the Ashkelon, which had a port, which was a town distinct from it. The Ascalon of the Philistines, which existed down into Christian times, must have been inland.

Benjamin of Tudela in the 12th cent. who had been on the spot, and who is an accurate eyewitness<sup>9</sup>, says, "From Ashdod are two parasangs to Ashkelonah<sup>10</sup>; this is new Ashkelon which Ezra the priest built on the sea-shore, and they at first called it Benibra<sup>11</sup>, and it is distant from the old Ashkelon, which is desolate, four parasangs." When the old

5 Woe unto the inhabitants of <sup>i</sup> the sea coast, the nation of the Cherethites! the Ashkelon perished, is unknown. If, as seems probable from some of the antiquities dug up, the Ashkelon, at which Herod was born and which he beautified, was the seaport town, commerce probably attracted to it gradually the inhabitants of the neighbouring town of Ascalon, as the population of the Piræus now exceeds that of Athens.

The present Ashkelon is a ghastly skeleton; all the framework of a city, but none there. "The soil is good," but the "peasants who cultivate it" prefer living outside in a small village of mud-huts, exposed to winds and sand-storms, because they think that God has abandoned it, and that evil spirits (the Jân and the Ghûl) dwell there <sup>1</sup>.

Even the remains of antiquity, where they exist, belong to later times. A hundred men excavated in Ashkelon for 14 days in hopes of finding treasure there. They dug 18 feet below the surface, and found marble shafts, a Corinthian capital, a colossal statue with a Medusa's head on its chest, a marble pavement and white-marble pedestal <sup>2</sup>. The excavation reached no Philistine Ashkelon.

"Broken pottery," "pieces of glass," "fragments of polished marble" "of ancient columns, cornices &c." were the relics of a Greek Gaza.

Though then it is a superfluity of fulfilment, and what can be found belongs to a later city, still what can be seen has an impressive correspondence with the words Gaza is forsaken; for there are miles of fragments of some city connected with Gaza. The present Gaza occupies the southern half of a hill built with stone for the Moslem conquerors of Palestine. "Even the traces of its former existence, its vestiges of antiquity, are very rare; occasional columns of marble or gray granite, scattered in the streets and gardens, or used as thresholds at the gates and doors of houses, or laid upon the front of watering-troughs. One fine Corinthian capital of white marble lies inverted in the middle of the street." These belong then to times later than Alexander, since whose days the very site of Gaza must have changed its aspect.

Ashkelon shall be a desolation. The site of the port of Ascalon was well chosen, strong, overhanging the sea, fenced from the land, stretching forth its arms towards the Mediterranean, as if to receive in its bosom the wealth of the sea, yet shunned by the poor hinds around it. It lies in such a living death, that it is "one of the most mournful scenes of utter desolation" which a traveller "even in this land of ruins ever beheld." But this too cannot be the Philistine city. The sands which are pressing hard upon the solid walls of the city, held back by them for the time, yet threatening to overwhelm "the spouse of Syria," and which accumulated in the plain below, must have buried the old Ashkelon, since in this land, where the old names so cling to the spot, there is no trace of it.

Ekron shall be uprooted; and at Akîr and Esdûd "celebrated at present, for its scorpions," the few stones, which remain, even of a later town, are but as gravestones to mark the burial place of departed greatness.

"<sup>7</sup> In like way, all who glory in bodily strength and worldly power and say, By the strength of my hand I have done it, shall be left desolate and brought to nothing in the day of the Lord's anger." And "the waster," they who by evil words and deeds injure or destroy others and are an offence unto them, these shall be cast out shamefully, into outer darkness "<sup>8</sup> when the saints shall receive the fullest brightness" in the mid-day of the Sun of Righteousness. The judgement shall not be in darkness, save to them, but in mid-day, so that the justice of God shall be clearly seen, and darkness itself shall be turned into light, as was said to David, <sup>9</sup> Thou didst this thing secretly, but I will do it before all Israel and before the sun; and our Lord, <sup>10</sup> Whatsoever ye have spoken in darkness shall be heard in the light; and that which ye have spoken in the ear in closets shall be proclaimed upon the housetops; and St. Paul, <sup>11</sup> the Lord shall come, Who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the heart. And "they who by seducing words in life or in doctrine uprooted others, shall be themselves rooted up <sup>12</sup>."

5. The woe having been pronounced on the five cities apart, now falls upon the whole nation of the Cherethites or Philistines. The Cherethites are only named as equivalent to the Philistines, probably as originally a distinct immigration of the same people <sup>13</sup>. The name is used by the Egyptian slave of the Amalekite <sup>14</sup> for those whom the author of the first book of Samuel calls Philistines <sup>15</sup>. Ezekiel uses the name parallel with that of Philistines, with reference to the destruction which God would bring upon them <sup>16</sup>.

The word of the Lord comes not to them, but upon them, overwhelming them. To them He speaketh not in good, but in evil; not in grace, but in anger; not in mercy, but in vengeance. Philistia was the first enemy of the Church. It shewed its enmity to Abraham and Isaac and would fain that they should not sojourn among them <sup>17</sup>. They were the hindrance that Israel should not go straight to the promised land <sup>18</sup>. When Israel passed the Red Sea, <sup>19</sup> sorrow took hold of them. They were close to salvation in body, but far in mind. They are called Canaan, as being a chief nation of it <sup>20</sup>, and in that name lay the original source of their destruction. They inherited the sins of Canaan and with them his curse, preferring the restless beating of the barren, bitter sea on which they dwelt, "the waves of this troublesome world," to being a part of the true Canaan. They would absorb the Church into the world, and master it, subduing it to the heathen Canaan, not subdue themselves to it, and become part of the heavenly Canaan.

6. The sea-coast <sup>21</sup> shall be dwellings and cottages, lit.

Crete as the LXX supposed, rendering "Cretans" in Ezek., and here (as also the Syr.) "sojourners of the Cretans." Hence perhaps also Tacitus' statement (Hist. v. 2.) that the Jews had been expelled from Crete. The other versions render the word as appellative, "destroying" or "destroyed." Aq. and ἔθνος ἀλλόθριον, Theod. ἔθνος ἀλλόθριον Symm. ἔθνος ἀλλόθριον. S. cuttings or diggings<sup>1</sup>. This is the central meaning of the word; the place of the Cherethites (the cutters off) shall be cheroth of shepherds, places which they dug up that their flocks might be enclosed therein. The tracts once full of fighting men, the scourge of Judah, should be so desolate of its former people, as to become a sheep-walk. Men of peace should take the place of its warriors.

So the shepherds of the Gospel with their flocks have entered into possession of warlike nations, turning them to the Gospel. They are shepherds, the chief of whom is that Good Shepherd, Who laid down His Life for the sheep. And these are the sheep of whom He speaks, <sup>2</sup> Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear My Voice; and there shall be one fold and One Shepherd.

7. And the coast shall be. Or probably<sup>3</sup>, It shall be a portion for the remnant of the house of Judah. He uses the word, employed in the first assignment of the land to Israel<sup>4</sup>; and of the whole people as belonging to God, "<sup>5</sup> Jacob is the lot of His inheritance." The tract of the sea, which, with the rest, was assigned to Israel, which, for its unfaithfulness, was seldom, even in part, possessed, and at this time, was wholly forfeited, should be a portion for the mere remnant which should be brought back. David used the word in his psalm of thanksgiving, when he had brought the ark to the city of David, how God had "<sup>6</sup> confirmed the covenant to Israel, saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance;" and Asaph,<sup>7</sup> He cast out the heathen before them and divided to them an inheritance by line. It is the reversal of the doom threatened by Micah, <sup>8</sup> Thou shalt have none, that shall cast a cord by lot in the congregation of the Lord. The word is revived by Ezekiel in his ideal division of the land to the restored people<sup>9</sup>. <sup>10</sup> The gifts and calling of God are without repentance. The promise, which had slumbered during Israel's faithlessness, should be renewed to its old extent. "<sup>11</sup> There is no prescription against the Church." The boat threatens to sink; it is tossed, half-submerged, by the waves; but its Lord rebukes the wind and the sea; wind and sea obey Him, and there is a great calm<sup>12</sup>.

For the remnant of the house of Judah. Yet, who save He in Whose hand are human wills, could now foresee that Judah should, like the ten tribes, rebel, be carried captive, and yet, though like and worse than Israel in its sin<sup>13</sup>, should, unlike Israel, be restored? The re-building of Jerusalem was, their enemies pleaded, contrary to sound policy<sup>14</sup>: the plea was for the time accepted; for the rebellions of Jerusalem were recorded in the chronicles of Babylon<sup>15</sup>. Yet the falling short of the complete restoration depended on their own wills. God turned again their captivity; but they only, whose spirit God stirred, willed to return. The temporal restoration was the picture of the spiritual. They who returned had to give up lands and possessions in Babylonia, and a remnant only chose the land of promise at such cost. Babylonia was as attractive as Egypt formerly.

In the houses of Ashkelon shall they lie down in the evening. One city is named for all. They shall lie down, he says, continuing the image from their flocks, as Isaiah, in a like passage<sup>16</sup>, The first-born of the poor shall feed, and the needy shall lie down in safety.

The true Judah shall overspread the world; but it too shall only be a remnant; these shall, in safety, <sup>17</sup> go in and out and find pasture. In the evening of the world they shall find their rest; for then also in the time of Anti-Christ, the Church shall be but a remnant still. For the Lord their God shall visit them, for He is the Good Shepherd, Who came to seek the one sheep which was lost and Who says of Himself, <sup>18</sup> I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick; and Who in the end will more completely turn away their captivity, bring His banished to their everlasting home, the Paradise from which they have been exiled, and separate for ever the sheep from the goats who now oppress and scatter them abroad<sup>19</sup>.

8. I, <sup>20</sup> God, Who know all things, I heard i. e., have known within Me, in My mind, not anew but from eternity, and now I shew in effect that I know it; wherefore I say that I hear, because I act after the manner of one who perceiveth something anew." I, the just Judge, heard<sup>21</sup>. He was present and heard, even when, because He avenged not, He seemed not to hear, but laid it up in store with Him to avenge in the due time<sup>22</sup>.

The reproach of Moab and the reviling of the children of Ammon, whereby they have reproached My people. Both words, reproached, reviled, mean, primarily, cutting speeches; both are intensive, and are used of blaspheming God as unable to help His people, or reviling His people as forsaken by Him. If directed against man, they are directed against God through man. So David interpreted the taunt of Goliath, <sup>23</sup> reviled the armies of the living God, and the Philistine

<sup>1</sup> So Kim. Ibn Denan has, "caves which shepherds inhabit;" Arab. transl. "domiciles which shepherds dig." Abulw., and Tanchum derive it from כפר 2 Kgs. vi. 23. "a feast." Abulw. thinks this not improbable, as an irregular plural. Tanchum, "stations of shepherds where they turn their flocks to feed and sit down to eat, or places in which they dig for watering the flocks." The climate of Judæa, however, does not admit of underground habitations, like Nineveh, and in the country of the Philistines flocks would be supplied by wells with trenches. No Arabic authority suggests a derivation from כפר "nest" (as Ewald). The allusion to Cherethim would be lost by this invented root. Rashi has "a place where the shepherds eat." A. E. explains כפר, as if it were from כפר, "which the shepherds כפר for themselves." The Moabite stone has כפר l. 25, apparently, of "a ditch" or "moat."

<sup>2</sup> S. John x. 16. <sup>3</sup> Grammatically, כפר may be either the subject or predicate. For even in prose (Josh. xix. 20.) it is used without the article, of the sea-coast, the mention of the sea having preceded, "the goings forth thereof were to the sea, סתכל to Mizpeh." Yet there is no emphasis in the repetition of the word from the preceding verse. The LXX renders סתכל as the subject, the Ch. Vulg. as the predicate.

cursed David by his gods<sup>1</sup>. In a Psalm David complains, <sup>2</sup>the reproaches of them that reproached Thee are fallen upon me; and a Psalm which cannot be later than David, since it declares the national innocence from idolatry, connects with their defeats, the voice of him <sup>3</sup>that reproacheth and blasphemeth (joining the two words used here). The sons of Corah say, <sup>4</sup>with a sword in my bones, mine enemies reproach me, while they say daily unto me, where is thy God? So Asaph, <sup>5</sup>The enemy hath reproached, the foolish people hath blasphemed Thy Name; and, <sup>6</sup>we are become a reproach to our neighbours. Wherefore should the heathen say, where is their God? render unto our neighbours—the reproach wherewith they have reproached Thee, O Lord. And Ethan, <sup>7</sup>Remember, Lord, the reproach of Thy servants—wherewith Thine enemies have reproached, O Lord, wherewith they have reproached the footsteps of Thine Anointed.

In history the repeated blasphemies of Sennacherib and his messengers are expressed by the same words. In earlier times the remarkable concession of Jephthah, <sup>8</sup>Wilt not thou possess what Chemosh thy god giveth thee to possess? so whomsoever the Lord our God shall drive out before us, them will we possess, implies that the Ammonites claimed their land as the gift of their god Chemosh, and that that war was, as that later by Sennacherib, waged in the name of the false god against the True.

The relations of Israel to Moab and Ammon have been so habitually misrepresented, that a review of those relations throughout their whole history may correct some wrong impressions. The first relations of Israel towards them were even tender. God reminded His people of their common relationship and forbade him even to take the straight road to his own future possessions, across their land against their will. <sup>9</sup>Distress them not, nor contend with them, it is said of each, for I will not give thee of their land for a possession; for I have given it unto the children of Lot for a possession. Idolaters and hostile as they were, yet, for their father's sake, their title to their land had the same sacred sanction, as Israel's to his. I, God says, have given it to them as a possession. Israel, to their own manifest inconvenience, <sup>10</sup>went along through the wilderness, and compassed the land of Edom, and the land of Moab, but came not within the border of Moab. By destroying Sihon king of the Amorites and Og king of Bashan, Israel removed formidable enemies, who had driven Moab and Ammon out of a portion of the land which they had conquered from the Zanzummim and Anakim<sup>11</sup>, and who threatened the remainder. <sup>12</sup>Israel dwelt in all the cities of the Amorites.

Heshbon, Dibon, Jahaz, Medeba, Nophah were cities in the land of the Amorites, in which Israel dwelt. The exclusion of Moab and Ammon from the congregation of the Lord to the tenth generation<sup>13</sup> was not, of course, from any national antipathy, but intended to prevent a debasing intercourse; a necessary precaution against the sensuousness of their idolatries. Moab was the first<sup>14</sup> in adopting the satanic policy of Balaam, to seduce Israel by sensuality to their idolatries; but the punishment was appointed to the partners of their guilt, the Midianites<sup>15</sup>, not to Moab. Yet Moab was the second nation, whose ambition God overruled to chasten His people's idolatries. Eglon, king of Moab, united with himself Ammon and Amalek against Israel. The object of the invasion was, not the recovery of the country which Moab had lost to the Amorites but, Palestine proper. The strength of Moab was apparently not sufficient to occupy the territory of Reuben. They took possession only of the city of palm trees<sup>16</sup>; either the ruins of Jericho or a spot close by it; with the view apparently of receiving reinforcements or of securing their own retreat by the ford. This garrison enabled them to carry their forays over Israel, and to hold it enslaved for 18 years. The oppressiveness of this slavery is implied by the cry and conversion of Israel to the Lord, which was always in great distress. The memory of Eglon, as one of the oppressors of Israel, lived in the minds of the people in the days of Samuel<sup>17</sup>. In the end, this precaution of Moab turned to its own destruction; for, after Eglon was slain, Ephraim, under Ehud, took the fords, and the whole garrison, 10,000 of Moab's warriors, <sup>18</sup>every strong man and every man of might, were intercepted in their retreat and perished. For a long time after this, we hear of no fresh invasion by Moab. The trans-Jordanic tribes remained in unquestioned possession of their land for 300 years<sup>19</sup>, when Ammon, not Moab, raised the claim, <sup>20</sup>Israel took away my land, although claiming the land down to the Arnon, and already being in possession of the Southernmost portion of that land, Aroer, since Israel smote him from Aroer unto Min-ith<sup>21</sup>. The land then, according to a law recognised by nations, belonged by a twofold right to Israel; 1) that it had been won, not from Moab, but from the conquerors of Moab, the right of Moab having passed to its conquerors<sup>22</sup>; 2) that undisputed and unbroken possession "for time immemorial" as we say, 300 years, ought not to be disputed<sup>23</sup>. The defeat by Jephthah stilled them for near 50 years till the beginning of Saul's reign, when they refused the offer of the men of Jabesh-Gilead to serve them, and, with a mixture of insolence and savagery, annexed as a condition of accepting that entire submission, <sup>24</sup>that I may thrust out all your right eyes, to lay it as a reproach to Israel. The signal victory of Saul<sup>25</sup> still did not prevent Ammon, as well as Moab, from being among the enemies whom Saul worsted<sup>26</sup>. The term enemies implies that they were the assailants. The history of Naomi shews their prosperous condition, that the famine, which desolated Judah<sup>27</sup>, did not reach them, and that they were a prosperous land, at peace, at that time, with Israel. If all the links of the genealogy are preserved<sup>28</sup>, Jesse, David's father, was grandson of a Moabitess, Ruth, and perhaps on this ground David entrusted his parents to the care of the king of Moab<sup>29</sup>. Sacred history gives no hint, what was the cause of his terrible execution upon Moab. But a Psalm of David speaks to God of some blow, under which Israel had reeled. <sup>30</sup>O God, Thou hast abhorred us, and broken us in pieces; Thou hast been wroth: Thou hast made the land to tremble and cloven it asunder; heal its breaches, for it shaketh; Thou hast shewed Thy people a hard thing, Thou hast made it drink wine of reeling; and thereon David expresses his confidence that God would humble Moab, Edom, Philistia. While David then was engaged in the war with the Syrians of Mesopotamia and Zobah<sup>31</sup>, Moab must have combined with Edom in an aggressive war against Israel. The valley of

<sup>32</sup> It was probably the narrow valley some three miles long between the Northern end of that remarkable salt mountain, the Jebel or Khassm Usdum and the dead sea. See within Judah, since the city of salt<sup>1</sup> was one of the six cities of the wilderness. Since they had defeated Judah, they must have been overtaken there on their return<sup>2</sup>.

Yet this too was a religious war. "Thou," David says<sup>3</sup>, "hast given a banner to them that fear Thee, to be raised aloft because of the truth."

There is no tradition, that the kindred Psalm of the sons of Corah, Psalm xlv, belongs to the same time. Yet the protestations to God of the entire absence of idolatry could not have been made at any time later than the early years of Solomon. Even were there Maccabee Psalms, the Maccabees were but a handful among apostates. They could not have pleaded the national freedom from unfaithfulness to God, nor, except in two subordinate and self-willed expeditions<sup>4</sup>, were they defeated. Under the Persian rule, there were no armies nor wars; no immunity from idolatry in the later history of Judah. Judah did not in Hezekiah's time go out against Assyria; the one battle, in which Josiah was slain, ended the resistance to Egypt. Defeat was, at the date of this Psalm, new and surprising, in contrast with God's deliverances of old<sup>5</sup>; yet the inroad, by which they had suffered, was one of spoiling<sup>6</sup>, not of subdual. Yet this too was a religious war, from their neighbours. They were slain for the sake of God<sup>7</sup>, they were covered with shame on account of the reproaches and blasphemies<sup>8</sup> of those who triumphed over God, as powerless to help; they were a scorn and derision to the petty nations around them. It is a Psalm of unshaken faith amid great prostration: it describes in detail what the lxth Psalm sums up in single heavy words of imagery; but both alike complain to God of what His people had to suffer for His sake.

The insolence of Ammon in answer to David's message of kindness to their new king, like that to the men of Jabesh Gilead, seems like a deliberate purpose to create hostilities. The relations of the previous king of Ammon to David, had been kind<sup>9</sup>, perhaps, because David being a fugitive from Israel, they supposed him to be Saul's enemy. The enmity originated, not with the new king, but with the princes of the children of Ammon<sup>10</sup>. David's treatment of these nations<sup>11</sup> is so unlike his treatment of any others whom he defeated, that it implies an internecine warfare, in which the safety of Israel could only be secured by the destruction of its assailants.

Mesha king of Moab records one war, and alludes to others, not mentioned in Holy Scripture. He says, that before his own time, "Omri, king of Israel, afflicted Moab many days;" that "his son [Ahab] succeeded him, and he too said, 'I will afflict Moab.'" This affliction he explains to be that "12 Omri possessed himself of the land of Medeba" [expelling<sup>13</sup>, it is implied, its former occupiers] "and that" (apparently, Israel<sup>14</sup>) "dwelt therein," "[in his days and in] the days of his son forty years." He was also in possession of Nebo, and "the king of Israel" (apparently Omri,) "built [t] Jahaz and dwelt in it, when he made war with me."<sup>15</sup> Jahaz was near Dibon. In the time of Eusebius, it was still "pointed out between Dibon and Medeba"<sup>16</sup>. Mesha says, "And I took it to annex it to Dibon." It could not, according to Mesha also, have been S. of the Arnon, since Aroer lay between Dibon and the Arnon, and Mesha would not have annexed to Dibon a town beyond the deep and difficult ravine of the Arnon, with Aroer lying between them. It was certainly N. of the Arnon, since Israel was not permitted to come within the border of Moab, but it was at Jahaz that Sihon met them and fought the battle in which Israel defeated him and gained possession of his land, from the Arnon to the Jabbok<sup>17</sup>. It is said also that "18 Israel dwelt in the land of the Amorites from Aroer which is on the edge of the river Arnon"<sup>19</sup>, and the city which is in the river<sup>20</sup> unto Gilead. "21 Aroer on the edge of the river Arnon, and the city which is in the river Arnon, again occur in describing the southern border of Reuben, among whose towns Jahaz is mentioned, with Beth-Baal-Meon and Kiriathaim, which have been identified.

The afflicting then of Moab by Omri, according to Mesha, consisted in this, that he recovered to Israel a portion of the allotment of Reuben, between 9 and 10 hours in length<sup>22</sup> from N. to S., of which, in the time of Israel's weakness through the civil wars which followed on Jeroboam's revolt, Moab must have dispossessed Reuben. Reuben had remained in undisturbed possession of it, from the first expulsion of the Amorites to the time at least of Rehoboam, about five hundred years<sup>23</sup>. "The men of Gad" still "dwelt in Ataroth," Mesha says, "from time immemorial."

The picture, which Mesha gives, is of a desolation of the southern portion of Reuben. For, "I rebuilt," he says, "Baal-Meon, Kiriathaim, Aroer, Beth-bamoth, Bezer, Beth-Diblahaim, Beth-baal-Meon." Of Beth-Bamoth, and probably of Bezer, Mesha says, that they had previously been destroyed<sup>24</sup>. But Reuben would not, of course, destroy his own cities. They must then have been destroyed either by Mesha's father, who reigned before him, when invading Reuben, or by Omri, when driving back Moab into his own land, and expelling him from these cities. Possibly they were dismantled only, since Mesha speaks only of Omri's occupying Medeba, Ataroth, and Jahaz. He held these three cities only, leaving the rest dismantled, or dismantling them, unable to place defenders in them, and unwilling to leave them as places of ag-

<sup>14</sup> A gap in the broken stone probably contained the subject. I see that Schlottman also supplied, "Israel"; Dr. Ginsburg conjectured, less probably, "the enemy."

<sup>15</sup> In this place only Mesha speaks of the king of Israel's war with him in the past. Elsewhere he speaks of himself only as being on the offensive. "I fought against the city" [Ataroth]; "I fought against it" [Nebo]; "go down, fight against Horonaim." The king of Israel is apparently the same throughout, Omri.

There are only two letters, which may be בז or בז, perhaps בז "forsaken"] בז probably, in such simple Hebrew, signifies, in regard to all the towns, built. It is the one word used of the king of Israel and of Mesha, "he built;" "I built," although it is rarely used of building on to existing towns and fortifying them. (1 Kgs. xv. 17, 2 Chr. xi. 7) It is probably here used of re-building; since the cause of the building was the previous destruction.

the description in Tristram's Land of Isr., p. 326 sqq. At its N. extremity at the mouth of Wady Zuweirah there are considerable traces of (perhaps Roman) buildings. A tower placed here would command the entrance of the valley of salt, and thus may well have been the site of the city of salt.

<sup>2</sup> Seetzen guessed (Reisen ii. 356) and Robinson considered it certain (ii. 109) that "the valley of salt" was the lower part of the 'Arabah, close to the Dead Sea, between Edom and Judaea. But i. This is spoken of as a "great plain" (Seetzen p. 355) and although the word מֶלַח is twice used of as large valley; (1) the valley over against Baal Peor, where all Israel was encamped Deut. iii. 29, iv. 46; (2) that of Zephathah, where Asa, with an army of 580,000 men, defeated Zerah the Ethiopian with 1000,000 (2 Chr. xiv. 10) this is the exception. In eleven other places it is used of a narrow valley. ii. The depression, South of the dead Sea down to the Red Sea, had, in the time of Moses, the same title as now, the "Arabah," Deut. i. 1. ii. 8. iii. The space, near the Dead Sea, which is salt, "the Sebkhah, or desolate sand-swamp" (Tristram Moab, p. 41.) is impracticable for men; much more for an army. "The Sebkhah or salt-flat is a large flat, of at least 6 by 10 miles from N. to S. Taught by the experience of M. de Sauley, we made no attempt to cross it to the northwards, as the mud would have been far too deep and treacherous for us to pass in safety" (Id. Land of Israel, p. 336.). "The land South of the Sebkhah is not salt, but rich and fertile" (Id. p. 338). See de Sauley Voyage en Syrie &c. p. 248-256.

gression for Moab. But whether they ever were fortified towns at all, or how they were desolated, is mere conjecture. Only they were desolated in these wars.

But it appears from Mesha's own statement, that neither Omri nor Ahab invaded Moab proper. For in speaking of his successful war and its results, he mentions no town S. of the Arnon. He must have been a tributary king, but not a foot of his land was taken. The subsequent war was not a mere revolt, nor was it a mere refusal to pay tribute, of which Mesha makes no complaint. Nor could the tribute have been oppressive to him, since the spoils, left in the encampment of Moab and his allies shortly after his revolt, is evidence of such great wealth. The refusal to pay tribute would have involved nothing further, unless Ahaziah had attempted to enforce it, as Hezekiah refused the tribute to Assyria, but remained in his own borders. But Ahaziah, unlike his brother Jehoram who succeeded him, seems to have undertaken nothing, except the building of some ships for trade<sup>1</sup>. Mesha's war was a renewal of the aggression on Reuben.

Heshbon is not mentioned, and therefore must, even after the war, have remained with Reuben.

Mesha's own war was an exterminating war, as far as he records it. "I fought against the city," [Ataroth], he says, "and took it, and killed all the mighty of the city for the well-pleasing of Chemosh and of Moab;" "I fought against it [Nebo] from break of day till noon and took it, and slew all of it, 7000 men; the ladies and maidens I devoted to Ash-tar Chemosh;" to be desecrated to the degradations of that sensual idolatry. The words too "<sup>2</sup>Israel perished with an everlasting destruction" stand clear, whether they express Mesha's conviction of the past or his hope of the future.

The war also, on the part of Moab, was a war of his idol Chemosh against God. Chemosh, from first to last, is the agent. "Chemosh was angry with his land;" "Chemosh [was pleased] with it in my days;" "I killed the mighty for the well-pleasing of Chemosh;" "I took captive thence all [ ] and dragged it along before Chemosh at Kiriath;" "Chemosh said to me, Go and take Nebo against Israel;" "I devoted the ladies and maidens to Ashtar-Chemosh;" "I took thence the vessels of HVIH and dragged<sup>3</sup> them before Chemosh;" "Chemosh drove him [the king of Israel] out before [my face]"; "Chemosh said to me, Go down against Horonaim;" "Chemosh [ ] it in my days."

Contemporary with this aggressive war against Israel must have been the invasion by the children of Moab and the children of Ammon, the great multitude from beyond the sea, from Syria, in the reign of Jehoshaphat, which brought such terror upon Judah. It preceded the invasion of Moab by Jehoshaphat in union with Jehoram and the king of Edom. For the invasion of Judah by Moab and Ammon took place, while Ahab's son, Ahaziah, was still living. For it was after this, that Jehoshaphat joined with Ahaziah in making ships to go to Tarshish<sup>4</sup>. But the expedition against Moab was in union with Jehoram who succeeded Ahaziah. The abundance of wealth which the invaders of Judah brought with them, and the precious jewels with which they had adorned themselves, shew that this was no mere marauding expedition, to spoil; but that its object was, to take possession of the land or at least of some portion of it. They came by entire surprise on Jehoshaphat, who heard of them first when they were at Hazazon-Tamar or Engedi, some 36½ miles from Jerusalem<sup>5</sup>. He felt himself entirely unequal to meet them, and cast himself upon God. There was a day of public humiliation of Judah at Jerusalem. 7 Out of all the cities of Judah they came to seek the Lord. Jehoshaphat, in his public prayer, owned, 8 we have no might against this great company which cometh against us; neither know we what to do; but our eyes are upon Thee. He appeals to God, that He had forbidden Israel to invade Ammon, Moab, and Mount Seir, so that they turned away from them and destroyed them not; and now these rewarded them by "<sup>9</sup> coming to cast us out of Thy possession which Thou hast given us to inherit." One of the sons of Asaph foretold to the congregation, that they might go out fearlessly; for they should not have occasion to fight. A Psalm, ascribed to Asaph, records a great invasion, the object of which was the extermination of Israel. 10 They have said; Come and let us cut them off from being a nation, that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance. It had been a secret confederacy. 11 They have taken crafty counsel against Thy people. It was directed against God Himself, i. e. His worship and worshippers. 12 For they have taken counsel in heart together; against Thee do they make a covenant. It was a combination of the surrounding petty nations; Tyre on the N., the Philistines on the W.; on the South the Amalekites, Ishmaelites. Hagarenes; Eastwards, Edom, Gebal, Moab, Ammon. But its most characteristic feature was, that Assur (this corresponds with no period after Jehoshaphat) occupies a subordinate place to Edom and Moab, putting them forward and helping them. Assur also, Asaph says<sup>13</sup>, is joined with them; they have become an arm to the children of Lot. This agrees with the description, there is come against thee a great multitude from beyond the sea, from Syria.

Scripture does not record, on what ground the invasion of Moab by Jehoram and Jehoshaphat, with the tributary king of Edom, was directed against Moab proper; but it was the result doubtless of the double war of Moab against Reuben and against Judah. It was a war, in which the strength of Israel and Moab was put forth to the utmost. Jehoram had mustered all Israel<sup>14</sup>; Moab had gathered all who had reached the age of manhood and upwards, 15 every one who girded on a girdle and upwards. The three armies, which had made a seven days' circuit in the wilderness, were on the point of perishing by thirst and falling into the hands of Moab, when Elisha in God's name promised them the supply of their want, and complete victory over Moab. The eager cupidity of Moab, as of many other armies, became the occasion of his complete overthrow. The counsel with which Elisha accompanied his prediction, 16 ye shall smite every fenced city and every choice city, and every good tree ye shall fell, and all springs of water ye shall stop up, and every good piece of land ye shall waste with stones, was directed, apparently, to dislodge an enemy so inveterate. For water was essential to the fertility of their land and their dwelling there. We hear of no special infliction of death, like what Mesha records of himself. The war was ended by the king of Moab's sacrificing the heir-apparent of the king of Edom<sup>17</sup>, which naturally created great displeasure against Israel, in whose cause Edom thus suffered, so that they departed to their own land and finally revolted.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Chr. xx. 35, 36. <sup>2</sup> A break in the stone leaves the subject uncertain. "In my day said [ ], and I will look upon him and upon his house, and Israel perished with an everlasting destruction." Schlottman conjectures, probably, "Chemosh." Ganneau renders as if it were past, כשר, so Haug, Geiger, Neubauer, Wright; Schlottman, Noldeke, and Ginsburg, as future, כשר, though Ginsburg alone renders, "And Israel said, I shall destroy it for ever," which is impossible. <sup>3</sup> The word in

Their departure apparently broke up the siege of Ar and the expedition. Israel apparently was not strong enough to carry on the war without Edom, or feared to remain with their armies away from their own land, as in the time of David, of which Edom might take the advantage. We know only the result.

Moab probably even extended her border to the South by the conquest of Horonaim<sup>1</sup>.

After this, Moab is mentioned only on occasion of the miracle of the dead man, to whom God gave life, when cast into Elisha's sepulchre, as he came in contact with his bones. Like the Bedaween now, or the Amalekites of old, <sup>2</sup> the bands of Moab came into the land, as the year came. Plunder, year by year, was the lot of Israel at the hands of Moab.

On the East of Jordan, Israel must have remained in part (as Mesha says of the Gadites of Aroer) in their old border. For after this, Hazael, in Jehu's reign, smote Israel <sup>3</sup> from Aroer which is by the river Arnon; and at that time probably Ammon joined with him in the exterminating war in Gilead, destroying life before it had come into the world, that they might enlarge their border<sup>4</sup>. Jeroboam ii, B. C. 825, restored Israel to the sea of the plain<sup>5</sup>, i. e., the dead sea, and, (as seems probable from the limitation of that term in Deuteronomy<sup>6</sup>, under Ashdod-Pisgah Eastwards) to its Northern extremity, lower in latitude than Heshbon, yet above Nebo and Medeba, leaving accordingly to Moab all which it had gained by Mesha. Uzziah, a few years later, made the Ammonites tributaries<sup>7</sup> B. C. 810. But 40 years later B. C. 771, Pul, and, after yet another 30 years, 740, Tiglath-pileser having carried away the trans-jordanic tribes<sup>8</sup>, Moab again possessed itself of the whole territory of Reuben. Probably before. For B. C. 726, when Isaiah foretold that <sup>9</sup> the glory of Moab should be contemned with all that great multitude, he hears the wailing of Moab throughout all his towns, and names all those which had once been Reuben's and of whose conquest or possession Moab had boasted<sup>10</sup>, Nebo, Medeba, Dibon, Jahaz, Balth; as also those not conquered then, <sup>11</sup> Heshbon, Elealeh; and those of Moab proper, Luhith, Horonaim, and its capitals, Ar-Moab and Kir-Moab. He hears their sorrow, sees their desolation and bewails with their weeping<sup>12</sup>. He had prophesied this before<sup>13</sup>, and now, three years <sup>14</sup> before its fulfilment by Tiglath-Pileser, he renews it. This tender sorrow for Moab has more the character of an elegy than of a denunciation; so that he could scarcely lament more tenderly the ruin of his own people. He mentions also distinctly no sin there except pride. The pride of Moab seems something of common notoriety and speech. We have heard<sup>15</sup>. Isaiah accumulates words, to express the haughtiness of Moab; the pride of Moab; exceeding proud; his pride and his haughtiness and his wrath<sup>16</sup>, pride overpassing bounds, upon others. His words seem to be formed so as to keep this one bared thought before us, as if we were to say "pride, prideful, proudness, pridefulness;" and withal the unsubstantialness of it all, the unsubstantiality of his lies<sup>17</sup>. Pride is the source of all ambition; so Moab is pictured as retiring within her old bounds, the fords of Arnon, and thence asking for aid; her petition is met by the counter-petition, that, if she would be protected in the day of trouble, the out-casts of Israel might lodge with her now: be thou a covert to her from the face of the spoiler<sup>18</sup>. The prophecy seems to mark itself out as belonging to a time, after the two and a half tribes had been desolated, as stragglers sought refuge in Moab, and when a severe infliction was to come on Moab: the<sup>19</sup> remnant shall be small, small not great.

Yet Moab recovered this too. It was a weakening of the nation, not its destruction. Some 126 years after the prophecy of Isaiah, 30 years after the prophecy of Zephaniah, Moab, in the time of Jeremiah, was in entire prosperity, as if no visitation had ever come upon her. What Zephaniah says of the luxuriousness of his people, Jeremiah says of Moab; <sup>20</sup> Moab is one at ease from his youth; he is resting on his lees; and he hath not been emptied from vessel to vessel, neither hath he gone into captivity. <sup>21</sup> They say, We are mighty and strong men for the war. Moab was <sup>22</sup> a strong staff, a beautiful rod; <sup>23</sup> he magnified himself against the Lord; <sup>24</sup> Israel was a derision to him; he skipped for joy at his distress. Jeremiah repeats and even strengthens Isaiah's description of his pride; <sup>25</sup> his pride, proud, he repeats, exceedingly; his loftiness, again his pride, his arrogancy, and the haughtiness of his heart. Its strong holds<sup>26</sup> were unharmed; all its cities, far and near, are counted one by one, in their prosperity<sup>27</sup>; its summer-fruits and vintage were plenteous; its vines, luxuriant; all was joy and shouting. Whence should this evil come? Yet so it was with Sodom and Gomorrah just before its overthrow. It was, for beauty, <sup>28</sup> a paradise of God; well-watered everywhere; as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt. In the morning<sup>29</sup> the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of the furnace. The destruction foretold by Jeremiah is far other than the affliction spoken of by Isaiah. Isaiah prophesies only a visitation, which should reduce her people: Jeremiah foretells, as did Zephaniah, captivity and the utter destruction of her cities. The destruction foretold is complete. Not of individual cities only, but of the whole he saith, <sup>30</sup> Moab is destroyed. <sup>31</sup> The spoiler shall come upon every city, and no city shall escape, and the valley shall perish and the high places shall be destroyed, as the Lord hath spoken. Moab himself was to leave his land. <sup>32</sup> Flee, save your lives, and ye shall be like the heath in the wilderness. Chemosh shall go forth into captivity; his priests and his princes together. Give pinions unto Moab, that it may flee and get away, and her cities shall be a desolation; for there is none to dwell therein. It was not only to go into captivity, but its home was to be destroyed. <sup>33</sup> I will send to her those who shall upheave her, and they shall upheave her, and her vessels they shall empty, all her flagons (all that aforetime contained her) they shall break in pieces. <sup>34</sup> Moab is destroyed and her cities; <sup>35</sup> the spoiler of Moab is come upon her; he hath destroyed the strongholds. The subsequent history of the Moabites is in the words, <sup>36</sup> Leave the cities and dwell in the rock, dwellers of Moab, and be like a dove which nesteth in the sides of the mouth of the pit. The purpose of Moab and Ammon against Israel which Asaph complains of, and which Mesha probably speaks of, is retorted upon her. <sup>37</sup> In Heshbon they have devised evil against it; come and let us cut it off from being a nation. Moab shall be destroyed from being a people, because he hath magnified himself against the Lord.

Whence should this evil come? They had, with the Ammonites, been faithful servants of Nebuchadnezzar against Judah<sup>1</sup>. Their concerted conspiracy with Edom, Tyre, Zidon, to which they invited Zedekiah<sup>2</sup>, was dissolved. Nebuchadnezzar's march against Judæa did not touch them; for they<sup>3</sup> skipped with joy at Israel's distresses. The connection of Baalis, king of the Ammonites, with Ishmael<sup>4</sup> the assassin of Gedaliah, whom the king of Babylon made governor over the land<sup>5</sup> out of their own people, probably brought down the vengeance of Nebuchadnezzar. For Chaldeans too were included in the slaughter<sup>6</sup>. The blow seems to have been aimed at the existence of the people; for the murder of Gedaliah followed upon the rallying of the Jews<sup>7</sup> out of all the places whither they had been driven. It returned on Ammon itself, and on Moab who probably on this, as on former occasions, was associated with it. The two nations, who had escaped at the destruction of Jerusalem, were warred upon and subdued by Nebuchadnezzar in the 23rd year of his reign<sup>8</sup>, the 5th after the destruction of Jerusalem.

And then probably followed that complete destruction and disgraced end, in which Isaiah, in a distinct prophecy, sees Moab trodden down by God as the heap of straw is trodden down in the waters<sup>9</sup> of the dunghill, and he (Moab) stretcheth forth his hands in the midst thereof, as the swimmer stretcheth forth his hands to swim, and He, God, shall bring down his pride with the treacheries of his hands. It speaks much of the continued hostility of Moab, that, in prophesying the complete deliverance for which Israel waited, the one enemy whose destruction is foretold, is Moab and those pictured by Moab.<sup>11</sup> We have waited for Him and He will save us—For in this mountain (Zion) shall the hand of the Lord rest, and Moab shall be trodden down under Him.

After this, Moab, as a nation, disappears from history. Israel, on its return from the captivity, was again enticed into idolatry by Moabite and Ammonite wives, as well as by those of Ashdod and others<sup>12</sup>, Canaanites, Hittites, Perizzites, Jebusites, Egyptians, Amorites<sup>13</sup>. Sanballat also, who headed the opposition to the rebuilding of Jerusalem, was a Moabite<sup>14</sup>; Tobiah, an Ammonite<sup>15</sup>. Yet it went no further than intrigue and the threat of war. They were but individuals, who cherished the old hostility. In the time of the Maccabees, the Ammonites, not Moab, with a mighty power and much people were in possession of the Reubenite cities to Juzar<sup>16</sup>. It was again an exterminating war, in which the Jews were to be destroyed<sup>17</sup>. After repeated defeats by Judas Maccabæus, the Ammonites hired the Arabians<sup>18</sup> (not the Moabites) to help them, and Judas, although victorious, was obliged to remove the whole Israelite population,<sup>19</sup> all that were in the land of Gilead, from the least unto the greatest, even their wives, and their children, and their stuff, a very great host, to the end they might come into the land of Judæa. The whole population was removed, obviously lest, on the withdrawal of Judas' army, they should be again imperilled. As it was a defensive war against Ammon, there is no mention of any city, south of the Arnon, in Moab's own territory. It was probably with the view to magnify descendants of Lot, that Josephus speaks of the Moabites as being "even yet a very great nation"<sup>20</sup>. S. Justin's account, that there is "<sup>21</sup>even now a great multitude of Ammonites," does not seem to me to imply a national existence. A later writer says, "<sup>22</sup>Now not only the Edomites but the Ammonites and Moabites too are included in the one name of Arabians."

Some chief towns of Moab became Roman towns, connected by the Roman road from Damascus to Elath. Ar and Kir-Moab in Moab proper became Arcopolis and Charac-Moab, and, as well as Medeba and Heshbon in the country which had been Reuben's, preserve traces of Roman occupancy. As such, they became Christian Sees. The towns, which were not thus revived as Roman, probably perished at once, since they bear no traces of any later building.

The present condition of Moab and Ammon is remarkable in two ways; 1) for the testimony which it gives of its former extensive population; 2) for the extent of its present desolation. "How fearfully," says an accurate and minute observer<sup>23</sup>, "is this residence of old kings and their land wasted!" It gives a vivid idea of the desolation, that distances are marked, not by villages which he passes but by ruins<sup>24</sup>. "<sup>25</sup>From these ruined places, which lay on our way, one sees how thickly inhabited the district formerly was." Yet the ground remained fruitful. It was partly abandoned to wild plants, the wormwood and other shrubs<sup>26</sup>; partly, the artificial irrigation, essential to cultivation in this land, was destroyed<sup>27</sup>; here and there a patch was cultivated; the rest remained barren, because the crops might become the prey of the spoiler<sup>28</sup>, or the thin population had had no heart to cultivate it. A list of 33 destroyed places, which still retained their names, was given to Seetzen<sup>29</sup>, "of which many were cities in times of old, and besides these, a great number of other wasted villages. One sees from this, that, in the days of old, this land was extremely peopled and flourishing, and that destructive wars alone could produce the present desolation." And thereon he adds the names of 40 more ruined places. Others say:

<sup>27</sup> See Mr. Tristram's picture of "a ruin-covered ridge by an immense tank of solid masonry, 130 yards by 110 yards, at Ziza. From the surface of the water to the edge of the tank was 17 feet 6 inches. The masonry was simply magnificent. The whole system and artificial sluices were precisely similar to ancient works for irrigation in India and Ceylon. Such works easily explain to us the enormous population, of which the ruined cities give evidence. Every where is some artificial means of retaining the occasional supplies of rain water. So long as these precious structures remained in order, cultivation was continuous and famines remained unknown. The Islamic invasion left the miserable remnants of a dense and thriving nation entirely dependent on the neighbouring countries for their supply of corn: a dependence which must continue till these border lands are secure from the inroad of the predatory bands of the East." Land of Moab pp. 183-186. At Kustul is "a massive wall in the plain, about 600 yards in length across the valley, and 18 feet thick, built to dam up the water in the gentle depression, the head of the wady." Ib. c. 12. p. 220. "Gôr el Mearâa, as far as the soil can be watered, evinces a luxuriant fertility. By far the greater part of it is a waste." Seetz. ii. 352. "Gôr el Zâphîa owes its fruitfulness entirely to the water of the Wady el Hossa, which is guided to the fields in many canals. But only a very small portion of this exceedingly rich soil is cultivated, the rest is overgrown with bushes and shrubs, wherein very many wild boars, hyenas and other wild animals live." Ib. 355. "This water too [of the Nimnery] is said formerly to have been used for watering some fields, of which there is now no trace." Ib. 354.

Ib. 407, 8. <sup>25</sup> Ib. 411.

<sup>26</sup> "A little N. of el-Eale we came on good soil, which however lay wholly uncultivated and was mostly overgrown with the prickly little Bullân, which gave the country the look of moor-ground." Seetzen Travels, i. 406. "The soil here (Heshbon) is in this district excellent, but it lies wholly uncultivated and serves only for pasture to the little herds of sheep, goats, kine and camels of the Arabs." Ib. p. 407. "The Arabs cultivate a little ground near Madaba." p. 409. "The land (the other side the Mujeb [Arnon] and so in Moab proper) had little grass, but there was an extraordinary quantity of wormwood on it. Yet the soil seems excellent for wheat, although no spot was cultivated. Large spots had the look of our moors from the quantity of wormwood and other little shrubs." p. 410. "Here and there, there were tokens of cultivation, wheatfields; the wheat was good." p. 412.

"The whole of the fine plains in this quarter" [the S. of Moab] "are covered with sites of towns, on every eminence or spot convenient for the construction of one; and as all the land is capable of rich cultivation, there can be no doubt that this country, now so deserted, once presented a continued picture of plenty and fertility." "Every knoll" [in the highlands of Moab] "is covered with shapeless ruins.—The ruins consist merely of heaps of squared and well-fitting stones, which apparently were erected without mortar." "One description might serve for all these Moabite ruins. The town seems to have been a system of concentric circles, built round a central fort, and outside the buildings the rings continue as terrace-walks, the gardens of the old city. The terraces are continuous between the twin hillocks and intersect each other at the foot." "Ruined villages and towns, broken walls that once enclosed gardens and vineyards, remains of ancient roads; every thing in Moab tells of the immense wealth and population, which that country must have once enjoyed."

The like is observed of Ammon<sup>5</sup>. His was direct hatred of the true religion. It was not mere exultation at the desolation of an envied people. It was hatred of the worship of God. "Thus saith the Lord God; Because thou saidst, Aha, against My sanctuary, because it was profaned; and against the land of Israel, because it was desolated; and against the house of Judah, because they went into captivity." The like temper is shewn in the boast, "Because that Moab and Seir do say; Behold the house of Judah is like unto the heathen," i. e., on a level with them.

Forbearing and long-suffering as Almighty God is, in His infinite mercy, He does not, for that mercy's sake, bear the direct defiance of Himself. He allows His creatures to forget Him, not to despise or defy Him. And on this ground, perhaps, He gives to His prophecies a fulfilment beyond what the letter requires, that they may be a continued witness to Him. The Ammonites, some 1600 years ago, ceased to "be remembered among the nations." But as Nineveh and Babylon, and the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, by being what they are, are witnesses to His dealings, so the way in which Moab and Ammon are still kept desolate is a continued picture of that first desolation. Both remain rich, fertile; but the very abundance of their fertility is the cause of their desolation. God said to Ammon, as the retribution on his contumely: "therefore, behold, I give thee to the children of the East for a possession, and they shall set their encampments in thee, and place their dwellings in thee; they shall eat thy fruit and they shall drink thy milk; and I will make Rabbah a dwelling-place of camels, and the children of Ammon a couching-place for flocks." Of Moab He says also, "I will open the side of Moab from the cities, which are on his frontiers, the glory of the country, unto the men of the East with the Ammonites." And this is an exact description of the condition of the land at this day. All travellers describe the richness of the soil. We have seen this as to Moab. But the history is one and the same. One of the most fertile regions of the world, full of ruined towns, destitute of villages or fixed habitations, or security of property, its inhabitants ground down by those, who have succeeded the Midianites and the Amalekites, the children of the East. "Thou canst not find a country like the Belka," says the Arabic proverb<sup>10</sup>, but "the inhabitants cultivate patches only of the best soil in that territory when they have a prospect of being able to secure the harvest against the invasion of enemies." "We passed many ruined cities," said Lord Lindsay<sup>11</sup>, "and the country has once been very populous, but, in 35 miles at least, we did not see a single village; the whole country is one vast pasturage, overspread by the flocks and herds of the Anezee and Beni Hassan Bedouins."

The site of Rabbath Amman was well chosen for strength. Lying "in a long valley" through which a stream passed, "the city of waters" could not easily be taken, nor its inhabitants compelled to surrender from hunger or thirst. Its site, as the eastern bound of Peraea<sup>12</sup>, "the last place where water could be obtained and a frontier fortress against the wild tribes beyond," marked it for preservation. In Greek times, the disputes for its possession attest the sense of its importance. In Roman, it was one of the chief cities of the Decapolis, though its population was said to be a mixture of Egyptians, Arabians, Phœnicians<sup>13</sup>. The coins of Roman Emperors to the end of the second century contain symbols of plenty, where now reigns utter desolation<sup>14</sup>. In the 4th century, it and two other now ruined places, Bostra and Gerasa, are named as "most carefully and strongly walled." It was on a line of rich commerce filled with strong places, in sites well selected for repelling the invasions of the neighbouring nations<sup>15</sup>. Centuries advanced. It was greatly beautified by its Roman masters. The extent and wealth of the Roman city are attested both by the remains of noble edifices on both sides of the stream, and<sup>16</sup> by pieces of pottery, which are the traces of ancient civilised dwelling, strewed on the earth two miles from the city. "At this place, Amman, as well as Gerasa and Gamala, three colonial settlements within the compass of a day's journey from one another, there were five magnificent theatres and one amphi theatre, besides temples, baths, aqueducts, naumachia, triumphal arches." "Its theatre was the largest in Syria; its colonnade had at least 50 columns." The difference of the architecture shews that its aggrandisement must have been the work of different centuries: its "castle walls are thick, and denote a remote antiquity; large blocks of stone are piled up without cement and still hold together as well as if recently placed." It is very probably the same which Joab called David to take, after the city of waters had been taken; within it are traces of a temple with Corinthian columns, the largest seen there, yet "not of the best Roman times."

Yet Amman, the growth of centuries, at the end of our 6th century was destroyed. For "it was desolate before Islam, a great ruin." "No where else had we seen the vestiges of public magnificence and wealth in such marked contrast with the relapse into savage desolation." But the site of the old city, so well adapted either for a secure refuge for its inhabitants or for a secure depository for their plunder, was, on that very ground, when desolated of its inhabitants, suited for what God, by Ezekiel, said it would become, a place, where the men of the East should stable their flocks and herds, secure from straying. What a change, that its temples, the centre of the worship of its successive idols, or its theatres, its places of luxury or of pomp, should be stables for that drudge of man, the camel, and the stream which gave it the proud title of "city of waters" their drinking trough! And yet of the cities whose destruction is prophesied, this is foretold of Rabbah alone, as in it alone is it fulfilled! "Ammon," says Lord Lindsay<sup>3</sup>, "was situated on both sides of the stream; the dreariness of its present aspect is quite indescribable. It looks like the abode of death; the valley stinks with dead camels; one of them was rotting in the stream; and though we saw none among the ruins, they were absolutely covered in every direction with their dung." "Bones and skulls of camels were mouldering there [in the area of the ruined theatre] and in the vaulted galleries of this immense structure." "It is now quite deserted, except by the Bedouins, who water their flocks at its little river, descending to it by a wady, nearly opposite to a theatre (in which Dr. Mac Lennan saw great herds and flocks) and by the akiba. Re-ascending it, we met sheep and goats by thousands, and camels by hundreds." Another says<sup>4</sup>, "The space intervening between the river and the western hills is entirely covered with the remains of buildings, now only used for shelter for camels and sheep." Buckingham mentions incidentally, that he was prevented from sleeping at night "by the bleating of flocks and the neighing of horses, barking of dogs &c." Another speaks of "a small stone building in the Acropolis now used as a shelter for flocks." While he was "traversing the ruins of the city, the number of goats and sheep, which were driven in among them, was exceedingly annoying, however remarkable, as fulfilling the prophecies." "Before six tents fed sheep and camels." "Ezekiel points just to these, (xx. 5.) which passage Seetzen cites<sup>10</sup>. And in fact the ruins are still used for such stalls."

The prophecy is the very opposite to that upon Babylon, though both alike are prophecies of desolation. Of Babylon Isaiah prophesies, "It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there, neither shall the shepherds make fold there, but wild beasts of the desert shall lie there, and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and the ostriches shall dwell there, and the jackals shall cry in their desolate houses, and howling creatures in their pleasant palaces." And the ruins are full of wild beasts<sup>12</sup>. Of Rabbah Ezekiel prophesied that it should be "a possession for the men of the East, and I," God says, "will make Rabbah a stable for camels, and the Ammonites a couching-place for flocks;" and man's lawlessness fulfils the will and word of God.

9. Therefore as I live, saith the Lord of hosts. Life specially belongs to God, since He Alone is Underived Life. He hath life in Himself. He is entitled "the living God," as here, in tacit contrast with the dead idols of the Philistines<sup>15</sup>, with idols generally<sup>16</sup>; or against the blasphemies of Sennacherib<sup>17</sup>, the mockeries of scoffers<sup>18</sup>; of the awe of His presence<sup>19</sup>, His might for His people<sup>20</sup>; as the object of the soul's longings<sup>21</sup>, the nearness in the Gospel, children of the living God<sup>22</sup>. Since He can swear by no greater, He swears by Himself<sup>23</sup>. Since mankind are ready mostly to believe that God means well with them, but are slow to think that He is in earnest in His threats, God employs this sanction of what He says, twice only in regard to His promises or His mercy<sup>24</sup>; everywhere else to give solemnity to His threats<sup>25</sup>. The appeal to the truth of His own being<sup>26</sup> in support of the truth of His words is part of the grandeur of the prophet Ezekiel in whom it chiefly occurs. God says in the same meaning, by Myself have I sworn, of promises which required strong faith<sup>27</sup>.

Saith the Lord of Hosts. Their blasphemies had denied the very being of God, as God, to Whom they preferred or likened their idols; they had denied His power or that He could avenge, so He names His Name of power, the Lord of the hosts of heaven against their array against His border, I, the Lord of hosts Who can fulfil what I threaten, and the God of Israel Who Myself am wronged in My people, will make Moab as Sodom, and the children of Ammon as Gomorrah. Sodom and Gomorrah had once been flourishing cities, on the borders of that land, which Israel had won from the Amorite, and of which Moab and Ammon at different times possessed themselves, and to secure which Ammon carried on that exterminating war. For they were to the East of the plain between Bethel and Ai, where Lot made his choice, in the plain or circle of Jordan<sup>28</sup>, the well known title of the tract, through which the Jordan flowed into the Dead Sea. Near this, lay Zoar, (Ziara<sup>29</sup>) beneath the caves whither Lot, at whose prayer it had been spared, escaped from its wickedness. Moab and Ammon had settled and in time spread from the spot, wherein their forefathers had received their birth. Sodom, at least, must have been in that part of the plain, which is to the East of the Jordan, since Lot was bidden to flee to the mountains, with his wife and daughters, and there is no mention of the river, which would have been a hin-of nettles, and saltpits, and a perpetual desolation: * the residue of my people shall spoil them, and the remnant of my people shall possess them.

drance<sup>1</sup>. Then it lay probably in that "a broad belt of desolation" in the plain of Shittim, as Gomorrah and others of the Pentapolis may have lain in "the sulphur-sprinkled expanse" between El Riha [on the site of Jericho] and the dead sea, "covered with layers of salt and gypsum which overlies the loamy subsoil, literally fulfilling the descriptions of Holy Writ (says an eye witness),<sup>2</sup> Brimstone and salt and burning, that it is not sown nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein: a fruitful land turned into saltiness.<sup>3</sup> No man shall abide there, neither shall a son of man dwell in it." An elaborate system of artificial irrigation was carried through that cis-Jordanic tract, which decayed when it was desolated of man, and that desolation prevents its restoration.

The doom of Moab and Ammon is rather of entire destruction beyond all recovery, than of universal barrenness. For the imagery, that it should be the breeding [lit. possession] of nettles would not be literally compatible, except in different localities, with that of saltpits, which exclude all vegetation. Yet both are united in Moab. The soil continues, as of old, of exuberant fertility; yet in part, from the utter neglect and insecurity of agriculture it is abandoned to a rank and encumbering vegetation; elsewhere, from the neglect of the former artificial system of irrigation, it is wholly barren. The plant named is one of rank growth, since outcasts could lie concealed under it<sup>4</sup>. The preponderating authority seems to be for mollâch<sup>5</sup>, the Bedawin name of the "mallow," Prof. E. H. Palmer says<sup>6</sup>, "which," he adds, "I have seen growing in rank luxuriance in Moab, especially in the sides of deserted Arab camps."

The residue of My people shall spoil them, and the remnant of My people shall possess them. Again, a remnant only, but even these shall prevail against them, as was first fulfilled in Judas Maccabæus<sup>7</sup>.

10. This shall they have for their pride. lit. This to them instead of their pride. Contempt and shame shall be the residue of the proud man; the exaltation shall be gone, and all which they shall gain to themselves shall be shame. Moab and Ammon are the types of heretics<sup>10</sup>. As they were akin to the people of God, but hating it; akin to Abraham through a lawless birth, but ever molesting the children of Abraham, so heretics profess to believe in Christ, to be children of Christ, and yet ever seek to overthrow the faith of Christians. As the Church says, My mother's children are angry with me. They seem to have escaped the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah (heathen sins), and to have found a place of refuge (Zoar); and yet they are in darkness and cannot see the light of faith; and in an unlawful manner they mingle, against all right, the falsehood of Satan with the truth of God; so that their doctrines become, in part, doctrines of devils, in part have some stamp of the original truth. To them, as to the Jews, our Lord says, Ye are of your father the devil. While they profess to be children of God, they claim by their names to have God for their Father (Moab) and to be of His people (Ammon), while in hatred to His true children they forfeit both. As Moab seduced Israel, so they the children of the Church. They too enlarge themselves against the borders of the Church, rending off its children and making themselves the Church. They too utter reproaches and revilings against it. "Take away their revilings," says an early father<sup>12</sup>, "against the law of Moses, and the Prophets, and God the Creator, and they have not a word to utter." They too<sup>13</sup> remove the old landmarks which the fathers (the Prophets and Apostles) have set. And so, barrenness is their portion; as, after a time, heretics ever divide, and do not multiply; they are a desert, being out of the Church of God: and at last the remnant of Judah, the Church, possesses them, and absorbs them into herself.

11. The Lord will be terrible unto [upon] them, i. e. upon Moab and Ammon, and yet not in themselves only, but as instances of His just judgement. Whence it follows, For He will furnish all the gods of the earth. "Miserable indeed, to whom the Lord is terrible! Whence is this? Is not God by Nature sweet and pleasurable and serene, and an Object of longing? For the Angels ever desire to look into Him, and, in a wonderful and unspeakable way, ever look and ever long to look. For miserable they, whose conscience makes them shrink from the face of Love. Even in this life they feel this shrinking, and, as if it were some lessening of their grief, they deny it, as though this could destroy the truth, which they hold down in unrighteousness<sup>14</sup>."

For He will furnish<sup>15</sup> all the gods of the earth, taking away<sup>17</sup> the fat of their sacrifices, and the wine of their drink-offerings. Within 80 years from the death of our Lord<sup>18</sup>, the governor of Pontus and Bithynia wrote officially to the Roman Emperor, that "the temples had been almost left desolate, the sacred rites had been for a long time intermitted, and that the victims had very seldom found a purchaser," before the persecution of the Christians, and consulted him as to the amount of its continuance. Towards the close of the century, it was one of the Heathen complaints, which the Christian Apologist had to answer, "they are daily melting away the revenues of our temples." The Prophet began to speak of the subdual of Moab and Ammon; he is borne on to the triumphs of Christ over all the gods of the Heathen, when the worship of God should not be at Jerusalem only, but they shall worship Him, every one from his place.

Even all the isles of the heathen. For this is the very note of the Gospel, that "each who through faith in Christ was brought to the knowledge of the truth, by Him, and with Him, worshippeth from his place God the Father; and God is no longer known in Judæa only, but the countries and cities of the Heathen, though they be separated by the intervening sea from Judæa, no less draw nigh to Christ, pray, glorify, thank Him unceasingly. For formerly <sup>1</sup> His Name was great in Israel, but now He is well known to all every where; earth and sea are full of His glory, and so every one worshippeth Him from his place; and this is what is said, <sup>2</sup> As I live, saith the Lord, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord. The isles are any distant lands on the sea-shore<sup>3</sup>, especially the very distant<sup>4</sup>; but also Asia Minor<sup>5</sup> and the whole coast of Europe, and even the Indian Archipelago<sup>6</sup>, since the ivory and ebony came from its many isles. Zephaniah revives the term, by which Moses had spoken of the dispersion of the sons of Japhet; <sup>7</sup> By these were the isles of the Gentiles divided in their lands, every one after his tongue." He adds the word, all; all, wherever they had been dispersed, every one from his place, shall worship God. One universal worship shall ascend to God from all everywhere. So Malachi prophesied afterwards; <sup>8</sup> From the rising up of the sun even to the going down of the same My Name shall be great among the Gentiles, and in every place incense shall be offered unto God and a pure offering; for My Name shall be great among the heathen, saith the Lord of hosts." Even a Jew<sup>9</sup> says here: "This, without doubt, refers to the time to come, when all the inhabitants of the world shall know that the Lord is God, and that His is the greatness and power and glory, and He shall be called the God of the whole earth." The isles or coasts of the sea are the more the emblem of the Church, in that, <sup>10</sup> lying, as it were, in the sea of this world and encompassed by the civil events in it, as with bitter waters, and lashed by the most vehement waves of persecutions, the Churches are yet founded, so that they cannot fall, and rear themselves aloft, and are not overwhelmed by afflictions. For, for Christ's sake, the Churches cannot be shaken, and <sup>11</sup> the gates of hell shall not prevail against them."

12. Ye Ethiopians also, ye shall be slain by My sword. lit. Ye Ethiopians also, the slain of My sword are they. Having summoned them to His throne, God speaks of them, not to them any more; perhaps in compassion, as elsewhere in indignation<sup>12</sup>. The Ethiopians were not in any direct antagonism to God and His people, but allied only to their old oppressor, Egypt. They may have been in Pharaoh Necho's army, in resisting which, as a subject of Assyria, Josiah was slain: they are mentioned<sup>13</sup> in that army which Nebuchadnezzar smote at Carchemish in the 4th year of Jehoiakim. The prophecy of Ezekiel implies rather, that Ethiopia should be involved in the calamities of Egypt, than that it should be itself invaded. <sup>14</sup> Great terror shall be in Ethiopia, when the slain shall fall in Egypt." <sup>15</sup> Ethiopia and Lybia and Lydia &c. and all the men of the land that is in league, shall fall with these, by the sword." <sup>16</sup> They also that uphold Egypt shall fall." Syene<sup>16</sup>, the frontier-fortress over against Ethiopia, is especially mentioned as the boundary also of the destruction. "Messengers," God says<sup>17</sup>, "shall go forth from Me to make the careless Ethiopians afraid," while the storm was bursting in its full desolating force upon Egypt. All the other cities, whose destruction is foretold, are cities of lower or upper Egypt<sup>18</sup>.

But such a blow as that foretold by Jeremiah and Ezekiel must have fallen heavily upon the allies of Egypt. We have no details; for the Egyptians would not, and did not tell of the calamities and disgraces of their country. No one does. Josephus, however, briefly but distinctly says<sup>19</sup>, that after Nebuchadnezzar had in the 23rd year of his reign, the 5th after the destruction of Jerusalem, "reduced into subjection Moab and Ammon, he invaded Egypt, with a view to subdue it," "killed its then king, and having set up another, captured for the second time the Jews in it and carried them to Babylon." The memory of the devastation by Nebuchadnezzar lived on apparently in Egypt, and is a recognised fact among the Mohammedan historians, who had no interest in the fulfilment of Jewish prophecy, of which it does not appear that they even knew. Bokht-nasar [Nebuchadnezzar], they say, <sup>20</sup> made war on the son of Nechas [Necho], slew him and ruined the city of Memphis and many other cities of Egypt: he carried the inhabitants captive, without leaving one, so that Egypt remained waste forty years without one inhabitant." Another says, <sup>21</sup> The refuge which the king of Egypt granted to the Jews who fled from Nebuchadnezzar brought this war upon it: for he took them under his protection and would not give them up to their enemy. Nebuchadnezzar, in revenge, marched against the king of Egypt and destroyed the country." "One may be certain," says a good authority<sup>22</sup>, "that the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar was a tradition generally spread in Egypt and questioned by no one." Ethiopia was then involved, as an ally, and as far as its contingent was concerned, in the war, in which Nebuchadnezzar desolated Egypt for those 40 years. But, although this fulfilled the prophecy of Ezekiel, Isaiah, some sixty years before Zephaniah, prophesied a direct conquest of Ethiopia. I have given, God says<sup>23</sup>, Egypt as thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee. It lay in God's purpose, that Cyrus should restore His own people, and that his ambition should find its vent and compensation in the lands beyond. It may be that, contrary to all known human policy, Cyrus restored the Jews to their own land, willing to bind them to himself, and to make them a frontier territory towards Egypt, not subject only but loyal to himself. This is quite consistent with the reason which he assigns; <sup>24</sup> The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth; and He hath charged me to build Him an house at Jerusalem which is in Judah; and with the statement of Josephus, that he was moved thereto by "<sup>1</sup> reading the prophecy which Isaiah left, 210 years before." It is, alas! nothing new to Christians to have mixed motives for their actions: the exception is to have a single motive, "for the glory of God." The advantage to himself would doubtless flash at once on the founder of a great empire, though it did not suggest the restoration of the Jews. Egypt and Assyria had always, on either side, wished to possess themselves of Palestine, which lay between them. Any how, one Persian monarch did restore the Jews; his successor possessed himself of "Egypt, and part, at least, of Ethiopia." Cyrus wished, it is related <sup>2</sup>, "to war in person against Babylon, the Bactrians, the Sacæ, and Egypt." He perished, as is known, before he had completed <sup>3</sup> the third of his purposed conquests. Cambyses, although after the conquest of Egypt he planned ill his two more distant expeditions, reduced "<sup>4</sup> the Ethiopians bordering upon Egypt" ["lower Ethiopia and Nubia"], and these "brought gifts" permanently to the Persian Sovereign. Even in the time of Xerxes, the Ethiopians had to furnish their contingent of troops against the Greeks. Herodotus describes their dress and weapons, as they were reviewed at Doriscus <sup>5</sup>. Cambyses, then, did not lose his hold over Ethiopia and Egypt, when forced by the rebellion of Pseudo-Smerdis to quit Egypt.

13. Zephaniah began by singling out Judah amid the general destruction, <sup>7</sup> I will also stretch out My Hand upon Judah; he sums up the judgement of the world in the same way; He will stretch out, or, Stretch He forth<sup>8</sup>, His Hand against the North and destroy Asshur, and make Nineveh a desolation. Judah had, in Zephaniah's time, nothing to fear from Assyria. Isaiah <sup>9</sup> and Micah <sup>10</sup> had already foretold, that the captivity would be to Babylon. Yet of Assyria alone the prophet, in his own person, expresses his own conformity with the mind of God. Of others he had said, the word of the Lord is against you, O Canaan, and I will destroy thee; As I live, saith the Lord, Moab shall be as Sodom. Ye also, O Ethiopians, the slain of My sword are they. Of Assyria alone, by a slight inflection of the word, he expresses that he goes along with this, which he announces. He does not say as an imprecation, "May He stretch forth His hand;" but gently, as continuing his prophecies, and, joining on Asshur with the rest; only instead of saying "He will stretch forth," by a form almost insulated in Hebrew, he says, And stretch He forth His Hand. In a way not unlike, David having declared God's judgements, The Lord trieth the righteous; and the wicked and the lover of violence doth His soul abhor, subjoineth, On the wicked rain He snares, signifying that he (as all must be in the Day of judgement), is at one with the judgement of God. This is the last sentence upon Nineveh, enforcing that of Jonah and Nahum, yet without place of repentance now. He accumulates words expressive of desolation. It should not only be a desolation <sup>11</sup>, as he had said of Ashkelon, Moab and Ammon, but a dry, parched <sup>12</sup>, unfruitful <sup>13</sup> land. As Isaiah, under the same words, prophesies that the dry and desolate land <sup>14</sup> should, by the Gospel, be glad, so the gladness of the world should become dryness and desolation. Asshur is named, as though one individual <sup>15</sup>, implying the entireness of the destruction; all shall perish, as one man; or as gathered into one and dependent upon one, its evil King. The North is not only Assyria, in that its armies came upon Judah from the North, but it stands for the whole power of evil <sup>16</sup>, as Nineveh for the whole beautiful, evil, world. The world with "the princes of this world" shall perish together.

14. And flocks shall lie down in the midst of her. No desolation is like that of decayed luxury. It preaches the nothingness of man, the fruitlessness of his toils, the fleetingness of his hopes and enjoyments, and their baffling when at their height. Grass in a court or on a once beaten road, much more, in a town, speaks of the passing away of what has been, that man was wont to be there, and is not, or is there less than he was. It leaves the feeling of void and forsakenness. But in Nineveh not a few tufts of grass here and there shall betoken desolation, it shall be one wild rank pasture, where flocks shall not feed only, but lie down as in their fold and continual resting-place, not in the outskirts only or suburbs, but in the very centre of her life and throng and busy activity, in the midst of her, and none shall fray them away. So Isaiah had said of the cities of Aroer, <sup>17</sup> they shall be for flocks, which shall lie down and none shall make them afraid, and of Judah till its restoration by Christ, that it should be <sup>18</sup> a joy of wild asses, a pasture of flocks. And not only those which are wont to be found in some connection with man, but all the beasts of a nation <sup>19</sup>, the troops of wild and savage and unclean beasts which shun the dwellings of man or are his enemies, these in troops have their lair there.

Sometimes a prayer seems to be thus interwoven with prediction as, Nu. xxiv. 7, "her seed shall be in many waters, and exalted be (עָרָה) his king above Amalek, and exalted shall be his kingdom" and shall flourish as the cedars of Lebanon: at that time shall Lebanon be glorified as yew with joy and jubilee: the glory of Lebanon is given to it; they shall see the glory of the Lord, the excellency of our God." The peculiarity here is, that it stands so apart and independent of the preceding, with which it connects it. The shade of meaning is strewn upon the ground, and among those desolate fragments of her pride shall unclean animals haunt. The pelican has its Hebrew name from vomiting. It vomits up the shells which it had swallowed whole, after they had been opened by the heat of the stomach, and so picks out the animal contained in them<sup>1</sup>, the very image of greediness and uncleanness. It dwells also not in deserts only but near marshes, so that Nineveh is doubly waste.

A voice shall sing in the windows. In the midst of the desolation, the muteness of the hedgehog and the pensive loneliness of the solitary pelican, the musing spectator is even startled by the gladness of a bird, joyous in the existence which God has given it. Instead of the harmony of music<sup>2</sup> and men-singers and women-singers in their palaces shall be the sweet music of some lonely bird, unconscious that it is sitting in the windows of those, at whose name the world grew pale, portions of the outer walls being all which remain of her palaces. Desolation shall be in the thresholds, sitting, as it were, in them; every where to be seen in them; the more, because unseen. Desolation is something oppressive; we feel its presence. There, as the warder watch and ward at the empty portals, where once was the fullest throng, shall desolation sit, that no one enter. For He shall uncover [hath uncovered E. M.] the cedar-work: in the roofless palaces, the carved cedar-work shall be laid open to wind and rain. Any one must have noticed, how piteous and dreary the decay of any house in a town looks, with the torn paper hanging uselessly on its walls. A poet of our own said of the beautiful ruins of a wasted monastery:

“For the gay beams of lightsome day

But at Nineveh it is one of the mightiest cities of the world which thus lies waste, and the bared cedar-work had, in the days of its greatness, been carried off from the despoiled Lebanon<sup>3</sup> or Hermon<sup>4</sup>.

15. This utter desolation is the rejoicing city (so unlike is it, that there is need to point out that it is the same); this is she, who was full of joy, exulting exceedingly<sup>5</sup>, but in herself, not in God; that dwelt carelessly, lit. securely, and so carelessly; saying Peace and safety<sup>6</sup>, as though no evil would come upon her, and so perishing more certainly and miserably<sup>7</sup>. That said in her heart, this was her inmost feeling, the moving cause of all her deeds; I am and there is none beside me; literally,<sup>8</sup> and there is no I besides, claiming the very attribute of God (as the world does) of self-existence, as if it alone were I, and others, in respect of her, were as nothing. Pantheism, which denies the being of God, as Author of the world, and claims the life in the material world to be God, and each living being to be a part of God, is only this self-idolatry, reflected upon and carried out in words. ‘All the pride of the world, all self-indulgence which says, Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die, all covetousness which ends in this world, speaks this by its acts, I and no I beside.

How is she become a desolation, has passed wholly into it, exists only as a desolation, a place for beasts to lie down in, a mere den for the wild beasts. Every one that passeth by her shall hiss in derision, and wag [or wave] his hand in detestation, as though putting the hand between them and it, so as not to look at it, or, as it were, motioning it away. The action is different from that of <sup>9</sup> clapping the hands in exultation.

“It is not difficult,” S. Jerome says, “to explain this of the world, that when the Lord hath stretched forth His Hand over the North and destroyed the Assyrian, the Prince of this world, the world also perishes together with its Princes, and is brought to utter desolation, and is pitied by none, but all hiss and shake their hands at its ruin. But of the Church it seems, at first sight, blasphemous to say that it shall be a pathless desert, and wild beasts shall dwell in her, and that afterwards it shall be said insultingly over her; ‘This is the city given up to ill, which dwelt carelessly and said in her heart, I and none besides.’ But whoso should consider that of the Apostle, wherein he says, <sup>10</sup> in the last days perilous times shall come, and what is written in the Gospel, that <sup>11</sup> because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold, so that then shall that be fulfilled, When the Son of Man cometh, shall He find the faith on the earth? he will not marvel at the extreme desolation of the Church, that, in the reign of Antichrist, it shall be reduced to a desolation and given over to beasts, and shall suffer whatever the Prophet now describes. For if for unbelief God spared not the natural branches, but brake them off, and turned rivers into a wilderness and the water-springs into a dry ground, and a fruitful land into barrenness, for the iniquity of them that dwell therein, why not as to those of whom He had said, <sup>12</sup> He turneth the wilderness into a standing water, and dry ground into water-springs, and there He maketh the hungry to dwell; and as to those whom out of the wild olive He hath grafted into the good olive tree, why, if forgetful of this benefit, they depart from their Maker and worship the Assyrian, should He not undo them and bring them to the same thirst wherein they were before? ## CHAPTER III.

1 A sharp reproof of Jerusalem for divers sins.
8 An exhortation to wait for the restoration of Israel, 14 and to rejoice for their salvation by God.

Or,
gluttonous.
+ Heb. craw.

of Anti-christ or of the end of the world, yet it may, day by day, be understood of those who feign to be of the Church of God, and in works deny it, are hearers of the word not doers, who in vain boast in an outward show, whereas herds i. e. troops of vices dwell in them, and brute animals serving the body, and all the beasts of the field which devour their hearts [and pelicans, i. e. gluttons<sup>1</sup>, whose god is their belly] and hedgehogs, a prickly animal full of spikes which pricketh whatever it toucheth. After which it is subjoined, that the Church shall therefore suffer this, or hath suffered it, because it lifted itself up proudly and raised its head like a cedar, given up to evil works, and yet promising itself future blessedness, and despising others in its heart, nor thinking that there is any other besides itself, and saying, I am, and there is no other beside me, how is it become a solitude, a lair of beasts! For where before dwelt the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and Angels presided over its ministries, there shall beasts dwell. And if we understand that, every one that passeth by shall hiss, we shall explain it thus; when Angels shall pass through her, and not remain in her, as was their wont, they shall be amazed and marvel, and shall not support and bear her up with their hand, when falling, but shall lift up the hands and shall pass by. Or they shall make a sound as those who mourn. But if we understand this of the devil and his angels, who destroyed the vine also that was brought out of Egypt, we shall say, that through the soul, which before was the temple of God and hath ceased so to be, the serpent passeth, and hisseth and spitteth forth the venom of his malice in her, and not this only, but setteth in motion his works which figuratively are called hands."

"<sup>2</sup> The earlier and partial fulfilment of prophecy does not destroy, it rather confirms, the entire fulfilment to come. For whoso heareth of the destruction of mighty cities, is constrained to believe the truth of the Gospel, that the fashion of this world passeth away, and that, after the likeness of Nineveh and Babylon, the Lord will in the end judge the whole world also."

C. III. 1. The "woe," having gone round the heathen nations, again circles round where it began, the <sup>3</sup> Jerusalem that killed the prophets and stoned those that were sent unto her. Woe upon her, and joy to the holy Jerusalem, the new Jerusalem<sup>4</sup>, the Jerusalem which is from above, the mother of us all, close this prophecy; both in figure; destruction of her and the whole earth, in time, the emblem of the eternal death; and the love of God, the foretaste of endless joy in Him.

Wo<sup>5</sup> rebellious and polluted<sup>6</sup>; thou oppressive city<sup>7</sup>! The address is the more abrupt, and bursts more upon her, since the prophet does not name her. He uses as her proper name, not her own name, "city of peace," but "rebellious," "polluted;" then he sums up in one, thou oppressive city.

Jerusalem's sin is threefold, actively rebelling against God; then, inwardly defiled by sin; then cruel to man. So then, towards God, in herself, towards man, she is wholly turned to evil, not in passing acts, but in her abiding state, 1) rebellious, 2) defiled, 3) oppressive. She is known only by what she has become, and what has been done for her in vain. She is rebellious, and so had had the law; defiled, and so had been cleansed; and therefore her state is the more hopeless.

2. She obeyed not the Voice, of God, by the law or the prophets, teaching her His ways; and when, disobeying, He chastened her, she received not correction, and when He increased His chastisements, she, in the declining age of the state and deepening evil, turned not unto Him, as in the time of the judges, nor ceased to do evil.

In the Lord she trusted not, but in Assyria or Egypt or her idols. Our practical relation to God is summed up in the four words, "Mistrust self; trust God." Man reverses this, and when "self-trust" has of course failed him, then he "mistrusts God."<sup>8</sup> Such rarely ask of God, what they hope they may obtain from man. They strain every nerve of their soul to obtain what they want; canvass, flatter, fawn, bribe, court favour; and betake themselves to God when all human help fails. They would be indebted, not to God, but to their own diligence. For the more they receive of God, the less, they see, can they exalt their own diligence, the more they are bound to thank God, and obey Him the more strictly."

To her God she drew not nigh, even in trouble, when all draw nigh unto Him, who are not wholly alien from Him; she drew not near by repentance, by faith, hope or love, or by works meet for repentance, but in heart remained far from Him. And yet He was her own God, as He had shewn Himself in times past, Who changes not, while we change; is faithful to us, while we fail Him; is still our God, while we forget Him; waits, to have mercy upon us; shines on us while we interpose our earth-born clouds between us and Him. "<sup>9</sup> Not in body nor in place, but spiritually and inwardly do we approach to the uncircumscribed God," owning Him as our Father, to Whom we daily say "Our Father."

3. The prophet having declared the wickedness of the whole city, rehearses how each in Church and state, the ministers of God in either, who should have corrected the evil, themselves aggravated it. Not enemies, without, destroy her, but

Her princes within her, in the very midst of the flock, whom they should in God's stead feed with a true heart, destroy her as they will, having no protection against them. Her judges are evening wolves<sup>10</sup>; those who should in the Name of God redress all grievances and wrongs, are themselves like wild beasts, when most driven by famine. They gnaw not the

ments to light, so that no sin should be hid in the brightness of His Light, as He said by Hosea, Thy judgements are a light which goeth forth. "<sup>1</sup> Morning by morning, He shall execute His judgements, i.e., in bright day and visibly, not restraining His anger, but bringing it forth in the midst, and making it conspicuous, and, as it were, setting in open vision what He had foreannounced." Day by day God gives some warning of His judgements. By chastisements which are felt to be His on this side or on that or all around, He gives examples which speak to the sinner's heart. He faileth not. As God said by Habakkuk, that His promises, although they seem to linger, were not behind<sup>2</sup> the real time, which lay in the Divine mind, so, contrariwise, neither are His judgements. His hand is never missing<sup>3</sup> at the appointed time. But the unjust<sup>4</sup>, he, whose very being and character, iniquity, is the exact contrary to what he had said of the perfection of God, <sup>5</sup> Who doth not iniquity, or, as Moses had taught them in his song<sup>6</sup>, all His ways are judgement, a God of truth and without iniquity<sup>7</sup>, just and right is He. Knoweth no shame, as God saith by Jeremiah, <sup>8</sup> Thou refusedst to be ashamed. <sup>9</sup> They were not at all ashamed, neither could they blush. Even thus they would not be ashamed of their sins, <sup>10</sup> that they might be converted and God might heal them.

6. I have cut off [the] nations. God appeals to His judgements on heathen nations, not on any particular nation, as far as we know; but to past history, whether of those, of whose destruction Israel itself had been the instrument, or others. The judgements upon the nations before them were set forth to them, when they were about to enter on their inheritance, as a warning to themselves<sup>11</sup>. Defile not ye yourselves in any of these things; for in all these have the nations defiled themselves, which I cast out before you: and the land is defiled; therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land vomiteth out her inhabitants. And ye, ye shall keep My statutes and My judgements and shall not commit any of these abominations—And the land shall not spue you out when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations which were before you. The very possession then of the land was a warning to them; the ruins, which crowned so many of its hill-tops<sup>12</sup>, were silent preachers to them; they lived among the memories of God's visitations; if neglected, they were an earnest of future judgements on themselves. Yet God's judgements are not at one time only. Sennacherib appealed to their own knowledge, <sup>13</sup> Behold, thou hast heard what the kings of Assyria have done to all lands by destroying them utterly. Have the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed? Hezekiah owned it as a fact which he knew: <sup>14</sup> Of a truth, Lord, the kings of Assyria have laid waste all the nations and their land. And God owns him as His instrument: <sup>15</sup> Now I have brought it to pass, that thou shouldst be to lay waste defenced cities into ruinous heaps: and, <sup>16</sup> I will send him against an ungodly nation, and against the people of My wrath will I give him a charge, to take the spoil and to take the prey, and to tread them down as the mire of the streets, and says of him, It is in his heart to destroy and to cut off nations not a few. The king of Babylon too he describes as <sup>17</sup> the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms, that made the world as a wilderness, and destroyed the cities thereof. Habakkuk recently described the wide wasting by the Babylonians, and the helplessness of nations before him<sup>18</sup>.

Their towers, corner towers<sup>19</sup>, the most carefully fortified parts of their fortified cities, are desolate; I made their streets waste. The desolation is complete, within as well as without; ruin itself is hardly so desolate as the empty habitations and forsaken streets, once full of life, where

Would sound like voices from the dead."

7. I said, surely thou wilt fear Me. God speaks of things here, as they are in their own nature. It could not but be, that in the very presence of the Hand of God, destroying others but as yet sparing them, they must learn to fear Him; they must stand in awe of Him for His judgements on others; they must be in filial fear of Him for His loving longsuffering towards themselves. "Thou wilt receive instruction," corrected and taught through God's correction of others and the lighter judgements on themselves, as Solomon says, <sup>20</sup> I looked, I set my heart: I saw, I received instruction. He saith, receive, making it man's free act. God brings it near, commends it to him, exhorts, entreats, but leaves him the awful power to receive or to refuse. God speaks with a wonderful tenderness. "Surely thou wilt stand in awe of Me; thou wilt receive instruction; thou wilt now do what hitherto thou hast refused to do." There was (so to speak) nothing else left for them<sup>21</sup>, in sight of those judgements. He pleads their own interests. The lightning was ready to fall. The prophet had, in vision, seen the enemy within the city. Yet even now God lingers, as it were, <sup>22</sup> If thou hadst known in this thy day, the things which are for thy peace.

So their [her] dwelling should not be cut off. His own holy land which He had given them. A Jew paraphrases<sup>23</sup>, "And He will not cut off their dwellings from the land of the house of My Shechinah" (God's visible Presence in glory). Judah, who was before addressed thou, is now spoken of in the third person, her; and this also had wonderful tenderness. It is as though God were musing over her and the blessed fruits of her return to Him; "it shall not be needed to correct her further." Howsoever I punished them: lit. all (i.e., all the offences) which I visited upon her, as God saith of Himself, "<sup>24</sup> visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children," and this is mostly the meaning of the words <sup>1</sup>visit upon. Amid and notwithstanding all the offences which God had already chastised, He, in His love and compassion, still longeth, not utterly to remove them from His Presence, if they would but receive instruction now; but they would not. How often, our Lord says<sup>3</sup>, would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not. But indeed, probably, Of a truth<sup>4</sup> (it is a word strongly affirming what follows) they rose early, they corrupted all their doings; God gave them His warnings, awaited the result; they lost no time, they began with morning light; they hastened to rise, burthened<sup>5</sup> themselves, made sure of having the whole day before them, to—seek God as He had sent His Prophets, <sup>6</sup>rising early and sending them? No, nor even simply to do ill, but of set purpose to do, not this or that corruptly, but to corrupt all their doings. <sup>7</sup>“They with diligence and eagerness rose early, that, with the same haste wherewith they ought to have returned to Me, they might shew forth in deed what they had conceived amiss in their mind.” There are as many aggravations of their sin as there are words. The four Hebrew words bespeak eagerness, wilfulness, completeness, enormity, in sin. They rose early, themselves deliberately corrupted, of their own mind made offensive, all their doings, not slight acts, but deeds, great works done with a high hand<sup>7</sup>.

8. Therefore wait ye upon [for] Me. God so willeth not to punish, but that all should lay hold of His mercy, that He doth not here even name punishment. Judah had slighted His mercies; He was ready to forgive all they had sinned, if they would now receive instruction; they in return set themselves to corrupt all their doings. They had wholly forsaken Him. Therefore—we should have expected, as elsewhere, “Therefore I will visit all your iniquities upon you.” But not so. The chastisement is all veiled; the prophet points only to the mercy beyond. Therefore wait ye for Me. All the interval of chastisement is summed up in these words; i.e., since neither My mercies towards you, nor My chastisement of others, lead you to obey Me, therefore the time shall be, when My Providence shall not seem to be over you, nor My Presence among you<sup>8</sup>; but then, wait ye for Me<sup>9</sup> earnestly, intensely, perseveringly, until the day, that I rise up to the prey. The day is probably in the first instance, the deliverance from Babylon. But the words seem to be purposely enlarged, that they may embrace other judgements of God also. For the words to gather the nations, assemble the kingdoms, de- scribe some array of nations against God and His people; gathering themselves for their own end at that time, but, in His purpose, gathering themselves for their own destruction, rather than the mere tranquil reunion of those of different nations in the city of Babylon, when the Medes and Persians came against them. Nor again are they altogether fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem, or any other event until now. For although then a vast number of the dispersed Jews were collected together, and were at that time <sup>10</sup>“broken off” and out of covenant with God, they could hardly be called nations, (which are here and before<sup>11</sup> spoken of in contrast with Judah), much less kingdoms. In its fullest sense the prophecy seems to belong to the same events in the last struggle of Anti-Christ, as at the close of Joel<sup>12</sup> and Zechariah<sup>13</sup>. With this agrees the largeness of the destruction; to pour out upon them, in full measure, emptying out so as to overwhelm them<sup>14</sup>, Mine indignation, even all My fierce anger; for all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of My jealousy. The outpouring of all God’s wrath, the devouring of the whole earth, in the fullest sense of the words, belongs to the end of the world, when He shall say to the wicked, “Depart from Me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire.” In lesser degrees, and less fully, the substance of the prophecy has again and again been fulfilled to the Jewish Church before Christ, at Babylon and under the Maccabees; and to the Christian, as when the Mohammedans hemmed in Christendom on all sides, and the waves of their conquests on the East and West threatened to meet, overwhelming Christendom. The Church, having sinned, had to wait for a while for God Who by His Providence withdrew Himself, yet at last delivered it.

And since the whole history of the Church lies wrapt up in the Person of the Redeemer, the day that I rise up to the prey, is especially the Day in which the foundation of His Church was laid, or that in which it shall be completed; the Day whereon He rose again, as the first-fruits, or that Day in which He shall<sup>15</sup> stand again on the earth, to judge it; <sup>16</sup>so coming even as He went up into Heaven. Then, the prey<sup>17</sup> must be, what God vouchsafes to account as His gain, the prey which is taken from the mighty<sup>18</sup>, and the lawful captivity, the prey of the terrible one, which shall be delivered; even that spoil which the Father bestowed on Him Who made His soul an offering for sin<sup>19</sup>, the goods of the strong man<sup>20</sup> whom He bound, and spoiled us, His lawful goods and captives, since we had sold<sup>21</sup> ourselves under sin to him. <sup>22</sup>Christ lived again having spoiled hell, because <sup>23</sup>it was not possible (as it is

9 For then will I turn to the people <sup>a</sup> pure + language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord, to serve him written] that He, being by nature Life, should be holden of death.

Here, where spoken of with relation to the Church, the jealousy of Almighty God is that love for His people<sup>1</sup>, which will not endure their ill-treatment by those who (as all Anti-Christian power doth) make themselves His rivals in the government of the world.

9. For then, in the order of God's mercies. The deliverance from Babylon was the forerunner of that of the Gospel, which was its object. The spread of the Gospel then is spoken of in the connection of God's Providence and plan, and time is overlooked. Its blessings are spoken of, as then given when the earnest was given, and the people, from whom according to the flesh Christ was to be born, were placed anew in the land where He was to be born. "2 The prophet springs, as is his wont, to Christ and the time of the new law." And in Christ, the End of the law, the prophet ends.

I will turn, contrary to what they had before, to the people, lit. peoples, the nations of the earth, a pure language, lit. a purified lip. It is a real conversion, as was said of Saul at the beginning; 3 God [lit.] turned to him another heart. Before the dispersion of Babel the world was 4 of one lip, but that, impure, for it was in rebellion against God. Now it shall be again of one lip; and that, purified. The purity is of faith and of life, that they may call upon the Name of the Lord, not as heretofore on idols, but that every tongue should confess the one true God, Father Son and Holy Ghost, in Whose Name they are baptised. This is purity of faith. To 5 call upon the Name of the Lord Jesus is the very title of Christian worship; all that called upon the Name of Jesus, the very title of Christians 6. To serve Him with one consent, lit. with one shoulder, evenly, steadfastly, not unequally yoked, but all with united strength, bearing Christ's easy yoke and one another's burdens, fulfilling the law of Christ. This is purity of life. The fruit of the lips is the sacrifice of praise 7. God gave back one pure language, when, on the Day of Pentecost, the Holy Spirit, the Author of purity, came down in fiery tongues upon the Apostles, teaching them and guiding them into the whole truth 8, and to 9 speak to every one in his own tongue, wherein he was born, the wonderful works of God. Thenceforth there was to be a higher unity than that of outward language. For speech is not the outward sound, but the thoughts which it conveys and embodies. The inward thought is the soul of the words. The outward confusion of Babel was to hinder oneness in evil and a worse confusion. At Pentecost, the unity restored was oneness of soul and heart, wrought by One Spirit, Whose gift is the one Faith and the one Hope of our calling, in the One Lord, in Whom we are one, grafted into the one body, by our Baptism<sup>10</sup>. The Church, then created, is the One Holy Catholic Church diffused throughout all the world, everywhere with one rule of Faith, the Faith once for all delivered unto the saints, confessing one God, the Trinity in Unity, and serving Him in the one law of the Gospel with one consent. Christians, as Christians, speak the same language of Faith, and from all quarters of the world, one language of praise goes up to the One God and Father of all. "11 God divided the tongues at Babel, lest, understanding one another, they should form a destructive unity. Through proud men tongues were divided; through humble Apostles tongues were gathered in one. The spirit of pride dispersed tongues; the Holy Spirit gathered tongues in one. For when the Holy Spirit came upon the disciples, they spake with the tongues of all, were understood by all; the dispersed tongues were gathered into one. So then, if they are yet angry and Gentiles, it is better for them to have their tongues divided. If they wish for one tongue, let them come to the Church; for in diversity of the tongues of the flesh, there is one tongue in the Faith of the heart." In whatever degree the oneness is impaired within the Church, while there is yet one Faith of the Creeds, He Alone can restore it and turn to her a purified language, Who first gave it to those who waited for Him. Both praise and service are perfected above, where the Blessed, with one loud voice, 12 shall cry, Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the Throne and unto the Lamb; blessing and glory and wisdom and thanksgiving and honour and power and might be unto our God for ever and ever. And they who have come out of great tribulation and have washed their robes and made them white in the Blood of the Lamb, shall be before the Throne of God and serve Him day and night in His Temple 13."

10. From beyond the rivers<sup>14</sup> of Ethiopia. The furthest Southern people, with whom the Jews had intercourse, stand as the type of the whole world beyond. The utmost bound of the known inhabited land should not be the bound of the Gospel. The conversion of Abyssinia is one, but the narrowest fulfilment of the prophecy. The whole new world, though not in the mind of the prophet, was in the mind of Him Who spake by the prophet.

My suppliants. He names them as what they shall be when they shall come to Him. They shall come, as needy, to the Fountain of all good, asking for mercy of the unfailing Source of all mercy. But this sense is not itself proved (in both Syr. and Arab. incense is נָחַם not נָחַם) nor is incense plural; nor is there any parallelism of Cush and Phut in Nahum, but Phut and Lubim are historically named as allies of No.

although, by sin, alienated from Him; whence S. Paul says, we are the offspring of God<sup>1</sup>. They were dispersed, severed from the oneness in Him and from His house and family; yet still, looking on them as already belonging to Him, He calls them, My dispersed, as by Caiaphas, being high-priest, He prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation; and not for that nation only, but that also He should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad<sup>2</sup>.

Shall bring Mine offering<sup>3</sup>. The offering is the same as that which Malachi prophesies shall continue under the New Testament, which offering was to be offered to the Name of God, not in Jerusalem, but in every place from the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same. The dark skin of the Ethiopian is the image of ingrained sin, which man could not efface or change<sup>4</sup>: their conversion then declares how those steeped in sin shall be cleansed from all their darkness of mind, and washed white from their sins in Baptism and beautified by the grace of God. "The word of prophecy endeth in truth. For not only through the Roman empire is the Gospel preached, but it circles round the barbarous nations. And there are Churches everywhere, shepherds and teachers, guides and instructors in mysteries, and sacred altars, and the Lamb is invisibly sacrificed by holy priests among Indians too and Ethiopians. And this was said plainly by another prophet also<sup>5</sup>, For I am a great King, saith the Lord, and My Name is great among the heathen, and in every place incense is offered to My Name and a pure sacrifice."

11. In that day shalt thou not be ashamed for all thy doings, because God, forgiving them, will blot them out and no more remember them. This was first fulfilled in the Gospel. "No one can doubt that when Christ came in the flesh, there was an amnesty and remission to all who believed. For we are justified not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His great mercy. But we have been released from shame. For He hath restored us to freedom of access to God, Who for our sakes arose from the dead, and for us ascended to heaven in the presence of the Father. For Christ, our Forerunner, hath ascended for us now to appear in the presence of God. So then He took away the guilt of all and freed believers from failures and shame." St. Peter, even in heaven, must remember his denial of our Lord, yet not so as to be ashamed or pained any more, since the exceeding love of God will remove all shame or pain. "Mighty promise, mighty consolation. Now, before that Day comes, the Day of My Resurrection, thou wilt be ashamed and not without reason, since thou ownest by a true confession, all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags. But at that Day it will not be so, especially when that shall be which I promise thee in the Prophets and the Psalms, There shall be a Fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness; whence David also, exulting in good hope of the Holy Spirit, saith, "Thou shalt wash me and I shall be whiter than snow". For though he elsewhere saith, "they looked unto Him and were lightened, and their faces were not ashamed, yet in this mortal life, when the day of My Resurrection doth not fully shine upon thee, thou art after some sort ashamed; as it is written, What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? but that shame will bring glory, and, when that glory cometh in its place, will wholly pass away. But when the fulness of that day shall come, the fulness of My Resurrection, when the members shall rise, as the Head hath risen, will the memory of past foulness bring any confusion? Yea the very memory of the miseries will be the richest subject of singing, according to that, My song shall be always of the loving-kindness of the Lord." For how shall the redeemed forget the mercies of their redemption, or yet how feel a painful shame even of the very miseries, out of which they were redeemed by the fulness of the over-streaming Love of God?

But the word סוּחָה alone is common to the two passages, and the words לְהִיבִיחַ לָהֶם which occur in Is. xviii. 1, and לְהִיבִיחַ Ib. 7, make me think that this place rather was in the prophet's mind.

For then will I take away out of the midst of thee them that rejoice in thy pride. [those of thee who exult in pride<sup>14</sup>.] All confusion shall cease, because all pride shall cease, the parent of sin and confusion. The very gift of God becomes to the carnal a source of pride. Pride was to the Jew also the great hindrance to the reception of the Gospel. He made his boast of the law, yea, in God Himself, that he knew His will, and was a guide of others<sup>15</sup>, and so was the more indignant, that the heathen was made equal to him, and that he too was called to repentance and faith in Christ. So, going about to establish his own righteousness, he did not submit himself to the righteousness of God, but shut himself out from the faith and grace and salvation of Christ, and rejected Himself. So, "thy pride may be the pride in being the people of God, and having Abraham for their father. And thou shalt no more be haughty in My holy mountain," but thou shalt stand in the great and everlasting abiding-place of humility, knowing perfectly, that thou now 'knowest in part' only, and confessest truly that no one ever could or can by his own works be justified in the sight of God. "For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." Pride which is ever offensive to God, is yet more hideous in a holy place or a holy office, in Mount Sion where the temple was or in the Christian priesthood.

12. And I will also leave (over, as a remnant, it is still the same heavy prophecy, that a remnant only shall be saved<sup>16</sup>) an afflicted and poor people. When the rest were cast out of the midst of her, these should be left in the midst of her (the words stand in contrast with one another) in the bosom of the Church. And they shall trust in the name of the Lord. So then those instructed in His laws after His example, think humbly of themselves. They became most exceedingly loved of God, and chiefly the divine disciples, who were set as lights of the world."

13. The remnant of Israel, the same poor people, the true Israel of whom God said, I leave over (the word is the same) a poor people, few, compared with the rest who were blinded; of whom the Lord said, I know whom I have chosen<sup>9</sup>. These shall not do iniquity nor speak lies. <sup>10</sup>"This is a spiritual adorning, a most beautiful coronet of glorious virtues. For where meekness and humility are and the desire of righteousness, and the tongue unlearns vain words and sinful speech, and is the instrument of strict truth, there dawns a bright and most perfect virtue. And this becometh those who are in Christ. For the beauty of piety is not seen in the Law, but gleams forth in the power of Evangelic teaching."

Our Lord said of Nathanael, <sup>11</sup>Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile, and to the Apostles, <sup>12</sup>I send you forth as sheep among wolves; be ye therefore wise as serpents and harmless as doves; and of the first Christians it is said, <sup>13</sup>they, continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God and having favour with all the people. This is the character of Christians, as such, and it was at first fulfilled; <sup>14</sup>whosoever is born of God, doth not commit sin; <sup>15</sup>whosoever is born of God sinneth not; but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not. An Apologist, at the close of the second century, could appeal to the Roman Emperor<sup>16</sup>, that no Christian was found among their criminals, "unless it be only as a Christian, or, if he be any thing else, he is forthwith no longer a Christian. We alone then are innocent! What wonder if this be so, of necessity? And truly of necessity it is so. Taught innocence by God, we both know it perfectly, as being revealed by a perfect Master; and we keep it faithfully, as being committed to us by an Observer, Who may not be despised." <sup>16</sup>"Being so vast a multitude of men, almost the greater portion of every state, we live silently and modestly, known perhaps more as individuals than as a body, and to be known by no other sign than the reformation of our former sins." Now in the Church, which "our earth dimm'd eyes behold," we can but say, as in regard to the cessation of war<sup>17</sup> under the Gospel, that God's promises are sure on His part, that still <sup>18</sup>they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts, that the Gospel is <sup>19</sup>a power of God unto salvation, that the <sup>20</sup>preaching of the Cross is, unto us which are saved, the power of God; <sup>21</sup>unto them that are called, Christ is the power of God and the wisdom of God; that those who will, <sup>22</sup>are kept by God through faith unto salvation; but that now too <sup>23</sup>they are not all Israel, which are of Israel, and that <sup>24</sup>the faithfulness of man does not make the faith of God of none effect. <sup>25</sup>"The Church of God is universally holy in respect of all, by institutions and administrations of sanctity; the same Church is really holy in this world, in relation to all godly persons contained in it, by a real infused sanctity; the same is farther yet at the same time perfectly holy in reference to the saints departed and admitted to the presence of God; and the same Church shall hereafter be most completely holy in the world to come, when all the members, actually belonging to it, shall be at once perfected in holiness and completed in happiness." Most fully shall this be fulfilled in the Resurrection. <sup>26</sup>"O blessed day of the Resurrection, in whose fulness no one will sin in word or deed! O great and blessed reward to every soul, which, although it hath now done iniquity and spoken falsehood, yet willeth not to do it further! Great and blessed reward, that he shall now receive such immoveableness, as no longer to be able to do iniquity or speak falsehood, since the blessed soul, through the Spirit of everlasting love inseparably united with God its Creator, shall now no more be capable of an evil will!"

For they shall feed; on the hidden manna, <sup>27</sup>nourished most delicately by the Holy Spirit with inward delights, and spiritual food, the bread of life." is delightful to estimate in their Acts," when they <sup>1</sup> bare His Name before the Gentiles and kings, and the children of Israel, and he who had been afraid of a little maid, said to the High Priest, <sup>2</sup> We ought to obey God rather than men. "3 When Christ the Good Shepherd Who laid down His life for His sheep, shone upon us, we are fed in gardens and pastured among lilies, and lie down in folds; for we are folded in Churches and holy shrines, no one scaring or spoiling us, no wolf assailing nor lion trampling on us, no robber breaking through, no one invading us, to steal and kill and destroy; but we abide in safety and participation of every good, being in charge of Christ the Saviour of all."

14. Sing, O daughter of Zion; shout, O Israel; be glad and rejoice with all the heart, O daughter of Jerusalem. Very remarkable throughout all these verses is the use of the sacred number three, secretly conveying to the thoughtful soul the thought of Him, Father Son and Holy Ghost, the Holy and Undivided Trinity by Whose operation these things shall be. Threefold is the description of their being freed from sins; 1) they shall not do iniquity, 2) nor speak lies, 3) neither shall a deceitful tongue be found in their mouth. Threefold their blessedness; They shall 1) feed, 2) lie down, 3) none make them afraid. Threefold the exhortation to joy here; "4 Sing to God the Father; shout to God the Son; be glad and rejoice in God the Holy Ghost, which Holy Trinity is One God, from Whom thou hast received it that thou art 1) the daughter of Zion, 2) Israel, 3) the daughter of Jerusalem; the daughter of Zion by faith, Israel by hope, Jerusalem by charity." And this hidden teaching of that holy mystery is continued; <sup>5</sup> The Lord, God the Father, hath taken away thy judgements; He God the Son, hath cast out (cleared quite away) thine enemy; the king of Israel, the Lord, the Holy Ghost, is in the midst of thee! The promise is threefold, 1) thou shalt not see evil any more; 2) fear thou not; 3) let not thine hands be slack. The love of God is threefold. 1) He will rejoice over thee with joy; 2) He will rest in His love; 3) He will joy over thee with singing. Again the words in these four verses are so framed as to be fulfilled in the end. All in this life are but shadows of that fulness. First, whether the Church or the faithful soul, she is summoned by all her names, daughter of Zion ("the thirsty" athirst for God) Israel ("Prince with God") Jerusalem ("City of peace"). By all she is called to the fullest joy in God with every expression and every feeling. Sing; it is the inarticulate, thrilling, trembling burst of joy; shout; again the inarticulate yet louder swell of joy, a trumpet-blast; and then too, deep within, be glad, the calm even joy of the inward soul; exult, the triumph of the soul which cannot contain itself for joy; and this, with the whole heart, no corner of it not pervaded with joy. The ground of this is the complete removal of every evil, and the full Presence of God.

15. The Lord hath taken away thy judgements; her own, because brought upon her by her sins. But when God takes away the chastisements in mercy, He removes and forgives the sin too. Else, to remove the judgements only, would be to abandon the sinner. He hath cast out, lit. cleared quite away<sup>6</sup>, as a man clears away all hindrances, all which stands in the way, so that there should be none whatever left—thine enemy; the one enemy, from whom every hindrance to our salvation comes, as He saith, <sup>7</sup> Now shall the prince of this world be cast out. The King of Israel, even the Lord, Christ the Lord, is in the midst of thee, of Whom it is said, <sup>8</sup> He that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them, and Who Himself saith, <sup>9</sup> Lo I am with you always unto the end of the world. <sup>10</sup> Where two or three are gathered together in My Name, there am I in the midst of you. He Who had removed from the midst of her the proud, Who had left in the midst of her those with whom He dwelleth, shall Himself dwell in the midst of her in mercy, as He had before in judgement<sup>11</sup>. He cleanseth the soul for His indwelling, and so dwelleth in the mansion which He had prepared for Himself. Thou shalt not see evil any more. For even the remains of evil, while we are yet in the flesh, are overruled, and <sup>12</sup> work together to good to those who love God. They cannot separate between the soul and Christ. Rather, He is nearer to her in them. We are bidden to <sup>13</sup> count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations, for all sorrows are but medicine from a father's hand. "14 And truly our way to eternal joy is to suffer here with Christ, and our door to enter into eternal life is gladly to die with Christ, that we may rise again from death and dwell with Him in everlasting life." So in the Revelation, it is first said that God should dwell with His people, and then that all pain shall cease. <sup>15</sup> Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them and be their God. And God shall wipe all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away. "16 In the inmost meaning of the words, he could not but bid her rejoice and be exceeding glad and rejoice with her whole heart, her sins being done away through Christ. For the holy and spiritual Zion, the Church, the multitude of believers, is justified in Christ Alone, and we are saved by Him and from Him, escaping the harms of our invisible enemies, and having in the midst of us the King and God of all, Who appeared in our likeness, the Word from God the Father, through Whom we see not evil, i. e. are freed from all who could do us evil. For He is the worker of our acceptableness, our peace, our wall, the bestower of incorruption, the dispenser of crowns, Who lighteneth the assaults of devils, Who giveth us to <sup>16</sup> tread on serpents and scorpions and all the power of the enemy—through Whom we are in good hope of immortality and life, adoption and glory, through Whom we shall not see evil any more."

16. In that day it shall be said to Jerusalem, Fear thou not; for <sup>17</sup> perfect love casteth out fear; whence He saith, <sup>18</sup> Fear not, little flock; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. Who then and what should the Church or the faithful soul fear, since mightier is He that is in her, than he that is in the world? And to Zion, Let not thine hands be slack, through faint-heartedness<sup>1</sup>, but work with all thy might; be ready to do or bear anything; since Christ worketh with, in, by thee, and <sup>2</sup> in due time we shall reap, if we faint not.

17. The Lord thy God in the midst of thee is mighty; He will save. What can He then not do for thee, since He is Almighty? What will He not do for thee, since He will save? Whom then should we fear? <sup>3</sup> If God be for us, who can be against us? But then was He especially in the midst of us, when God <sup>4</sup> the Word became flesh and dwelt among us; and we beheld His Glory, the Glory as of the Only-Begotten of the Father, full of grace and Truth. Thenceforth He ever is in the midst of His own. He with the Father and the Holy Spirit <sup>5</sup> come unto them and make Their abode with them, so that they are the temple of God. He will save, as He saith, <sup>6</sup> My Father is greater than all, and no man is able to pluck them out of My Father's hand. I and My Father are One. Of the same time of the Christ, Isaiah saith almost in the same words; <sup>7</sup> Strengthen ye the weak hands and confirm the feeble knees, Say to them that are of a feeble heart, Be strong, fear not, behold your God will come, He will come and save you; and of the Holy Trinity, <sup>8</sup> He will save us.

He will rejoice over thee with joy. Love, joy, peace in man are shadows of that which is in God, by Whom they are created in man. Only in God they exist undivided, uncreated. Hence God speaks after the manner of men, of that which truly is in God. God joyeth "with an uncreated joy" over the works of His Hands or the objects of His Love, as man joyeth over the object of his love. So Isaiah saith <sup>9</sup>, As the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee. As with uncreated love the Father resteth in good pleasure in His Well-beloved Son, so <sup>10</sup> God is well-pleased with the sacrifices of loving deeds, and, <sup>11</sup> the Lord delighteth in thee; and, <sup>12</sup> I will rejoice in Jerusalem and joy in My people; and, <sup>13</sup> the Lord will again rejoice over thee for good. And so in a two-fold way God meeteth the longing of the heart of man. The soul, until it hath found God, is evermore seeking some love to fill it, and can find none, since the love of God Alone can content it. Then too it longeth to be loved, even as it loveth. God tells it, that every feeling and expression of human love may be found in Him, Whom if any love, he only <sup>14</sup> loveth Him, because He first loved us. Every inward and outward expression or token of love are heaped together, to express the love of Him Who broodeth and as it were yearneth over (it is twice repeated) His own whom He loveth. Then too He loveth thee as He biddeth thee to love Him; and since the love of man cannot be like the love of the love, he will joy over thee with singing.

Infinite God, He here pictures His own love in the words of man's love, to convey to his soul the oneness wherewith love unites her unto God. He here echoes in a manner the joy of the Church, to which He had called her<sup>16</sup>, in words the self-same or meaning the same. We have joy here for joy there; singing or the unuttered unutterable jubilee of the heart, which cannot utter in words its joy and love, and joys and loves the more in its inmost depths because it cannot utter it. A shadow of the unutterable, because Infinite Love of God, and this repeated thrice; as being the eternal love of the Ever-blessed Trinity. This love and joy the Prophet speaks of, as an exuberant joy, one which boundeth within the inmost self, and again is wholly silent in His love, as the deepest tenderest most yearning love broods over the object of its love, yet is held still in silence by the very depth of its love; and then, again, breaks forth in outward motion, and leaps for joy, and uttereth what it cannot form in words; for truly the love of God in its unspeakable love and joy is past belief, past utterance, past thought. <sup>16</sup> Truly that joy wherewith He will be silent in His love, that exultation wherewith He will joy over thee with singing, <sup>17</sup> Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man." The Hebrew word<sup>18</sup> also contains the meaning, "He in His love shall make no mention of past sins<sup>19</sup>, He shall not bring them up against thee, shall not upbraid thee, yea, shall not remember them." It also may express the still, unvarying love of the Unchangeable God. And again how the very silence of God, when He seemeth not to hear, as He did not seem to hear S. Paul, is a very fruit of His love. Yet that entire forgiveness of sins, and that seeming absence are but ways of shewing His love. Hence God speaks of His very love itself, He will be silent in His love, as, before and after, He will rejoice, He will joy over thee.

18-21. In these verses still continuing the number "three," the prophecy closes with the final reversal of all which, in this imperfect state of things, seems turned upside down, when those who now mourn shall be comforted, they who now bear reproach and shame shall have glory, and those who now afflict the people of God shall be undone.

18. I will gather them that are sorrowful <sup>20</sup> for <sup>21</sup> the solemn assembly, in which they were to rejoice<sup>22</sup> before God and which in their captivity God made to cease<sup>23</sup>. They were of thee, the true Israel who were <sup>24</sup> grieved for the affliction of Joseph; to whom the reproach of it was a burden [rather<sup>25</sup>, on whom reproach was laid]: for this reproach of Christ is greater riches than the treasures of Egypt, and such shall inherit the blessing, <sup>26</sup> Blessed are ye, when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of Man's sake; rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy; for, behold your reward is great in heaven.

Then He shall act, He shall deal according to their deserts with all, evil men or devils, that afflict thee, His Church. The prophecy looked for a larger fulfilment than the destruction of Jerusalem, since the Romans who, in God's Hands, avenged the blood of His Saints, themselves were among those who afflicted her. And will save her, the flock or sheep that halteth<sup>5</sup>, "imperfect in virtue and with trembling faith," and gather, like a good and tender shepherd<sup>7</sup>, her that was driven out; scattered and dispersed through persecutions. All infirmities within shall be healed; all troubles without, removed.

And I will get them praise and fame [lit. I will make them a praise and a name] in every land where they have been put to shame<sup>8</sup>. Throughout the whole world have they been<sup>9</sup> the offscourings of all things; throughout the whole world should their praise be, as it is said, <sup>10</sup>Thou shalt make them princes in all lands. One of themselves saith<sup>11</sup>, Ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called. But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; and base things of this world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are. <sup>12</sup>These He maketh a praise and a name there, where they were without name and dispraised, confounding by them and bringing to nought those wise and strong and mighty, in whose sight they were contemptible."

THE PROPHET HAGGAI.

HAGGAI<sup>a</sup> is the eldest of the three-fold band, to whom, after the Captivity, the word of God came, and by whom He consecrated the beginnings of this new condition of the chosen people. He gave them these prophets, connecting their spiritual state after their return with that before the Captivity, not leaving them wholly desolate, nor Himself without witness. He withdrew them about 100 years after, but some 420 years before Christ came, leaving His people to long the more for Him, of Whom all the prophets spake. Haggai himself seems to have almost finished his earthly course, before he was called to be a prophet; and in four months his office was closed. He speaks as one who had seen the first house in its glory<sup>b</sup>, and so was probably among the very aged men, who were the links between the first and the last, and who laid the foundation of the house in tears<sup>c</sup>. After the first two months<sup>d</sup> of his office, Zechariah, in early youth, was raised up to carry on his message; yet after one brief prophecy was again silent, until the aged prophet had ended the words which God gave him. Yet in this brief space he first stirred up the people in one month to rebuild the temple<sup>e</sup>, prophesied of its glory through the presence of Christ<sup>f</sup>, yet taught that the presence of what was holy sanctified not the unholy<sup>g</sup>, and closes in Him Who, when Heaven and earth shall be shaken, shall abide, and they whom God hath chosen in Him<sup>h</sup>.

It has been the wont of critics, in whose eyes the Prophets were but poets<sup>i</sup>, to speak of the style of Haggai as "tame, destitute of life and power," shewing "a marked decline in" what they call "prophetic inspiration." The style of the sacred writers is, of course, conformed to their mission. Prophetic descriptions of the future are but incidental to the mission of Haggai. Preachers do not speak in poetry, but set before the people their faults or their duties in vivid earnest language. Haggai sets before the people vividly their negligence and its consequences; he arrests their attention by his concise questions; at one time retorting their excuses<sup>k</sup>; at another asking them abruptly, in God's name, to say why their troubles came<sup>l</sup>. Or he puts a matter of the law to the priests, that they may draw the inference, before he does it himself<sup>m</sup>. Or he asks them, what human hope had they<sup>n</sup>, before he tells them of the Divine. Or he asks them (what was in their heart), "Is not this house poor?" before he tells them of the glory in store for it. At one time he uses heaped and condensed antitheses<sup>p</sup>, to set before them one thought; at another, he enumerates, one by one, how the visitation of God fell upon all they had<sup>q</sup>, so that there seemed to be no end to it. At another, he uses a conciseness, like S. John Baptist's cry, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand, in his repeated Set your heart to your ways; and then, with the same idiom, set your heart<sup>r</sup> viz. to God's ways, what He had done on disobedience, what He would do on obedience. He bids them work for God, and then he expresses the acceptableness of that work to God, in the three words, And I will take pleasure in it and will be glorified. When they set themselves to obey, he encouraged them in the four words, I with you saith the Lord. This conciseness must have been still more impressive in his words, as delivered<sup>s</sup>. We use many words, because our words are weak. Many of us can remember how the House of Lords was hushed, to hear the few low, but sententious words of the aged general and statesman. But conceive the suggestive eloquence of those words, as a whole sermon, Set your heart on your ways.

Of distant prophecies there are but two<sup>t</sup>, so that the portion to be compared with the former prophets consists but of at most 7 verses. In these the language used is of the utmost simplicity. Haggai had but one message as to the future to convey, and he enforced it by the repeated use of the same word<sup>u</sup>, that temporal things should be shaken, the eternal should remain, as S. Paul sums it up<sup>v</sup>. He, the long-longed for, the chosen of God, the signet on His Hand, should come; God would fill that house, so poor in their eyes, with glory, and there would He give peace. Haggai had an all-containing but very simple message to give from God. Any ornament of diction would but have impaired and obscured its meaning. The two or three slight idioms, noticed by one after another, are, though slight, forcible<sup>w</sup>.

The office of Haggai was mainly to bring about one definite end, which God, Who raised him up and inspired him, ac-

ii. 1) Zechariah first prophesies in the 8th month (Zech. i. 1.). Haggai resumes at the close of the 9th and there ends (ii. 10, 20). On the same day in the 11th month, the series of visions were given to Zechariah. (Zech. i. 7.)

complished by him. It is in the light of this great accomplishment of the work entrusted to him at the verge of man's earthly course, that his power and energy are to be estimated. The words which are preserved in his book are doubtless (as indeed was the case as to most of the prophets) the representatives and embodiment of many like words, by which, during his short office, he roused the people from their dejection indifference and irreligious apathy, to the restoration of the public worship of God in the essentials of the preparatory dispensation.

Great lukewarmness had been shewn in the return. The few looked mournfully to the religious centre of Israel, the ruined temple, the cessation of the daily sacrifice, and, like Daniel, “confessed their sin and the sin of their people Israel, and presented their supplication before the Lord their God for the holy mountain of their God.” The most part appear, as now, to have been taken up with their material prosperity; and, at best, to have become inured to the cessation of their symbolical worship, connected, as it was, with the declaration of the forgiveness of their sins. Then too, God connected His declaration of pardon with certain outward acts: they became indifferent to the cessation of those acts. For few returned. The indifference was even remarkable among those, most connected with the altar. Of the 24<sup>b</sup> orders of priests, † only, 4 orders<sup>c</sup> returned; of the Levites only 74 individuals<sup>d</sup>; while of those assigned to help them, the Nethinim and the children of Solomon's servants, there were 392<sup>e</sup>. This coldness continued at the return of Ezra. The edict of Artaxerxes<sup>f</sup>, as suggested by Ezra, was more pious than those appointed to the service of God. In the first instance no Levite answered to the invitation<sup>g</sup>; on the special urgency and message of Ezra, “by the good hand of God upon us they brought us a man of understanding, of the sons of Levi; some 3 or 4 chief Levites; their sons and brethren; in all, 38; but of the Nethinim, nearly six times as many, 220<sup>h</sup>.” Those who thought more of temporal prosperity than of their high spiritual nobility and destination, had flourished doubtless in that exile as they have in their present homelessness, as “wanderers among the nations.” Haman calculated apparently on being able to “pay out of their spoils ten thousand talents of silver<sup>k</sup>, some £300,000,000, two-thirds of the annual revenue of the Persian Empire<sup>l</sup> into the king's treasures.”

The numbers who had returned with Zerubbabel had been (as had been foretold of all restorations) “a remnant only.” There were 42,360 free men, with 7337 male or female slaves<sup>m</sup>. The whole population which returned was not above 212,000, free-men and women and children. The proportion of slaves is about  $\frac{1}{10}$ , since in their case adults of both sexes were counted. The enumeration is minute, giving the number of their horses, mules, camels, asses<sup>n</sup>. The chief of the fathers however were not poor, since (though unspeakably short of the wealth, won by David and consecrated to the future temple) “they offered freely for the house of God, to set it up in its place, a sum about £117,100<sup>p</sup> of our money.” They had, beside, a grant from Cyrus, which he intended to cover the expenses of the building, the height and breadth whereof were determined by royal edict<sup>q</sup>.

The monarch, however, of an Eastern empire had, in proportion to its size, little power over his subordinates or the governors of the provinces, except by their recall or execution, when their oppressions or peculations notably exceeded bounds. The returned colony, from the first, were in fear of the nations, “the peoples of those countries<sup>r</sup>,” their old enemies probably; and the first service, “the altar to offer burnt-offerings thereon,” was probably a service of fear rather than of love, as it is said, “they set up the altar upon its bases; for it was in fear upon them from the peoples of the lands, and they offered burnt-offerings thereon unto the Lord.” They hoped apparently to win the favour of God, that He might, as of old, protect them against their enemies. However, the work was carried on “according to the grant that they had of Cyrus king of Persia;” and the foundations of the temple were laid amidst mixed joy at the carrying on of the work thus far, and sorrow at its poverty, compared to the first temple<sup>s</sup>. The hostility of the Samaritans discouraged them. Mixed as the religion of the Samaritans was,—its better element being the corrupt religion of the ten tribes, its worse the idolatries of the various nations, brought thither in the reign of Esarhaddon,—the returned Jews could not accept their offer to join in their worship, without the certainty of admitting, with them, the idolatries, for which they had been punished so severely. For the Samaritans pleaded the identity of the two religions. “Let us build with you, for we serve your God, as ye do; and we do sacrifice unto Him since the days of Esarhaddon which brought us up hither.” But in fact this mixed worship, in which “they feared the Lord and served their own gods,” came to this, that “they feared not the Lord, neither did they after the law and commandment which the Lord commanded the children of Jacob.” For God claims the undivided allegiance of His creatures; “these<sup>t</sup> feared the Lord and served their graven images, both their children and their children's children: as did their fathers, so do they to this day.” But this worship included some of the most cruel abominations of heathendom, the sacrifice of their children to their gods<sup>v</sup>.

The Samaritans, thus rejected, first themselves harassed the Jews in building, apparently by petty violence, as they did afterwards in the rebuilding of the walls by Nehemiah. “The people of the land weakened the hands of the people of Judah, and wore them out<sup>w</sup> in building.” This failing, they “hired counsellors (doubtless at the Persian court), to frustrate their purpose, all the days of Cyrus king of Persia, until the reign of Darius king of Persia.” The object of the intrigues was probably to intercept the supplies, which Cyrus had engaged to bestow, which could readily be effected in an Eastern Court without any change of purpose or any cognizance of Cyrus.

In the next reign of Ahashverosh (i. e. Khshvershe, a title of honour of Cambyses) “they wrote accusations against the Jews, seemingly without any further effect, since none is mentioned. Perhaps Cambyses, in his expedition to Egypt, knew more of the Jews, than the Samaritans thought, or he

ently, in acceding to Haman's proposal, made over to him the lives and property of the Jews. The silver is given unto thee, the people also, to do with them as it seemeth good to thee. (Ib. 11.) The Jews' property was confiscated with their lives. On the contrary, it was noticed, that the Jews, when permitted to defend their lives, did not lay their hands on the prey, which, by the king's decree, was granted to them, with authority to take the lives of those who should assault them. Ezr. viii. 11. ix. 10, 15, 16.

may have shrunk from changing his father's decree, contrary to the fundamental principles of Persism, not to alter any decree, which the sovereign (acting, as he was assumed to do, under the influence of Ormuzd) had written<sup>a</sup>. Pseudo-Smerdis (who doubtless took the title of honour, Artachshatr) may, as an impostor, have well been ignorant of Cyrus' decree, to which no allusion is made<sup>b</sup>. From him the Samaritans, through Rehum the chancellor, obtained a decree prohibiting, until further notice, the rebuilding of the city. The accusers had overreached themselves; for the ground of their accusation was, the former rebellions of the city<sup>c</sup>; the prohibition accordingly extended only to the city<sup>d</sup>, not to the temple. However, having obtained the decree, they were not scrupulous about its application, and made the Jews to cease by arm and power, the governor of the Jews being apparently unable, the governor of the cis-Euphratensian provinces being unwilling, to help. As this, however, was, in fact, a perversion of the decree, the Jews were left free to build, and in the second year of Darius Hystaspis, Haggai, and then Zechariah, prophesied in the name of the God of Israel to Zerubbabel, the native Governor, and Joshua the high-priest, and the Jews in Judah and Jerusalem; and they began to build the house of God in Jerusalem. Force was no longer used. Those engaged in building appealed to the edict of Cyrus; the edict was found at Ecbatana<sup>e</sup>, and the supplies which Cyrus had promised, were again ordered. The difficulty was at the commencement. The people had been cowed perhaps at first by the violence of Rehum and his companions; but they had acquiesced readily in the illegal prohibition, and had run each to his own house, some of them to their ceiled houses. All, employers or employed, were busy on their husbandry. But nothing flourished. The labourers' wages disappeared, as soon as gained<sup>f</sup>. East and West wind alike brought disease to their corn; both, as threatened upon disobedience in the law<sup>g</sup>. The East wind scorched and dried it up<sup>h</sup>; the warm West wind turned the ears yellow<sup>i</sup> and barren; the hail smote the vines, so that when the unfilled and mutilated clusters were pressed out, two-fifths only of the hoped-for produce was yielded; of the corn, only one half<sup>j</sup>.

In the midst of this, God raised up an earnest preacher of repentance. Haggai was taught, not to promise anything at the first, but to set before them, what they had been doing, what was its result. <sup>o</sup> He sets it before them in detail; tells them that God had so ordered it for their neglect of His service, and bids them amend. He bids them quit their wonted ways; go up into the mountain; bring wood; build the house. Conceive in Christian England, after some potatoe-disease, or foot-and-mouth-disease (in Scripture language "a murrain among the cattle"), a preacher arising and bidding them, consider your ways, and as the remedy, not to look to any human means, but to do something, which should please Almighty God; and not preaching only but effecting what he preached. Yet such was Haggai. He stood among his people, his existence a witness of the truth of what he said; himself one, who had lived among the outward splendours of the former temple; a contemporary of those, who said the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these; who had held it to be impossible that Judah should be carried captive; who had prophesied the restoration of the vessels of God<sup>k</sup>, which had been carried away, not, as God foretold, after the captivity, but as an earnest that the fuller captivity should not be<sup>l</sup>; yet who had himself, according to the prophecies of the prophets of those days, been carried into captivity, and was now a part of that restoration which God had promised. He stood among them "in gray-haired night," bade them do, what he bade them, in the name of God, to do; and they did it. When they had set about the work, he assured them of the presence of God with them<sup>m</sup>. A month later, when they were seemingly discouraged at its poorness, he promised them in God's name, that its glory should be greater than that of Solomon's<sup>n</sup>. Three days after, in contrast with the visitations up to that time, while there was as yet no token of any change, he promised them in the name of God, From this day will I bless you.

He himself apparently saw only the commencement of the work; for his prophecies lay within the second year of Darius and the temple was not completed till the sixth<sup>o</sup>. Even the favourable rescript of Darius must have arrived after his last prophecy, since it was elicited by the enquiry of the governor, consequent upon the commenced re-building<sup>p</sup>, three months only before his office closed<sup>q</sup>.

While this restoration of the public worship of God in its integrity was his main office, yet he also taught by parable<sup>r</sup> that the presence of what was outwardly holy did not, in itself, hallow those, among whom it was; but was itself unhallowed by inward unholiness.

Standing too amid the small handful of returned exiles, not, altogether, more than the inhabitants of Sheffield, he foretold, in simple all-comprehending words, that central gift of the Gospel, In this place will I give peace, saith the Lord. So had David, the sons of Korah, Micah, Isaiah, Ezekiel prophesied<sup>s</sup>; but the peace was to come, not then, but in the days of the Messiah. Other times had come, in which the false prophets had said<sup>t</sup>, Peace, peace, when there was no peace; when God had taken away His peace from this people. And now, when the chastisements were fulfilled, when the land lay desolate, when every house of Jerusalem lay burned with fire<sup>u</sup>, and the "blackness of ashes" alone "marked where they stood;" when the walls were broken down so that, even when leave was given to rebuild them, it seemed to their enemies a vain labour to revive the stones out of the heaps of rubbish which were burned; when the place of their fathers' sepulchres lay waste, and the gates thereof were consumed with fire; when, for their sakes, Zion was ploughed as a field and Jerusalem was become heaps—let any one picture to himself the silver-haired prophet standing, at first, alone, rebuking the people, first through their governor and the high-priest, then the collected multitude, in words, forceful from their simplicity, and obeyed! And then let them think whether anything of human or even Divine eloquence was lacking, when the words flew straight like arrows to the heart, and roused the people to do at once,
